NOTES OF WEEK
According to the Los Angeles, Cal., Examiner

Fifteen thousand miles of motion picture films were exported from the United States in the last fiscal year, and nearly 3,000 miles were imported.

The exact length of the motion picture films exported in the year ending June 30, 1912, according to the Division of Statistics of this Bureau, was 80,025,302 feet, valued at $6,815,060; the exact length of the motion picture films imported was 14,274,768 feet of "positives" valued at $825,083, exclusive of other films and plates valued at $179,130, of which the quantity is not stated.

A comparison of the exports in 1912 with those of preceding years is impracticable, since 1912 was the first fiscal year in which the quantity of motion picture films exported (measured in feet) was recorded in the statistical returns to the Department of Commerce and Lahor. The fact, however, that photographic goods, of which motion picture films form apparently about 75 per cent of the total, amounted to nearly $10,000,000 value in the exports of 1912, against a little over $7,000,000 in 1911, and $4,750,000 in 1910, suggests a very rapid growth in the exportation of motion picture films. On the import side the growth is much less strongly marked, the figures heing for "positives" 14,250,000 feet in 1912, against 11,750,000 in 1911.

A large proportion of the motion picture films now used in the various parts of the world are manufactured in the United States. About two-thirds of those exported go in the "unexposed" form, ready for use in taking pictures in those parts of the world to which sent. The other one-third is in the completed state, having been utilized in the United States in making finished motion picture films ready for use in placing illustrations upon the screen. Of the importations, practically all are "exposed" films, views taken in other parts of the world for use in the United States.

The high schools of Greater Boston are to be used throughout the winter for the instruction of the old as well as the young. After the close of the daily session the warm schoolrooms are not to be idle, for under the direction of Dr. Franklin B. Dyer, the new superintendent of schools, instructive entertainments are to be provided in the long winter evenings. Moving pictures will be used as the medium of instruction. Well selected films, portraying the events that are making current history as well as lighter subjects, have been selected.

Lectures will he given on the following subjects: General works, philosophy, sociology, philology, natural science, useful arts, fine arts, literature and history.

Domestic economy will fill an important place in the curriculum of popular instruction. Pictures will be shown illustrating every phase of domestic science. The best obtainahle authorities on the science of home building and home improvement will lecture in the high schools of the four centres, Roxbury, East Boston, South Boston and Charlestown.

KLEINE'S RELEASES WEEK ENDING NOV. 16TH

"On the Firing Line," for Tuesday, depicts an exciting military story interwoven among actual scenes of the Italian-Turkish War. The puhlic never tires of these war films, and will especially appreciate the opportunity of witnessing genuine action. The plot of the drama is simple and is a charming contrast to the scenes of the conflict.

The Wednesday Eclipse release, "Reviewing French Troops by Airship," shows remarkahle views of French army maneuvers and glimpses of the city of Paris taken from a dirigihle. The photography is above criticism, and every detail of the dwellings in the city is wonderfully hrought out. The reel is completed by two interesting topical subjects.

The Saturday Cines release, entitled "The Old Actor's Vision," is an extremely artistic piece of work. It describes the experiences of an old actor who has fallen into distress and when kind friends make him comfortahle he slowly sinks into a reverie and has vision after vision of his former triumphs upon the stage. The dreams are beautifully executed by douhle exposure and the whole picture play is worthy of the highest praise.

The reel is completed by a travelogue entitled "Life and Industries in Aden Campo," which spreads before us places of interest in and about the town and several delightful views of the picturesque bay.

The Paris Theatre on Curtis street near Eighteenth, Denver, Col., is perhaps the finest moving picture house in America, and was opened to the public on October 5th.

The new theatre embodies the most modern conceptions in ideal construction. Costing $300,000, it has innovations which New York and European cities have incorporated only in the last few months. It is absolutely fireproof, is spacious and has a system of ventilation which is declared to be the most perfect ever devised.

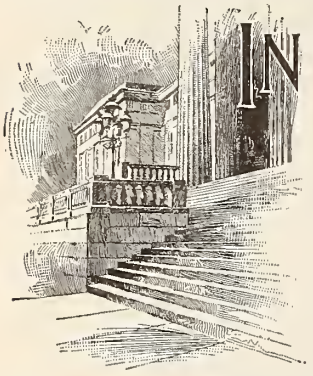
An individual screen ventilator heneath every other seat of the 2,300 in the theatre permits the introduction of a continual change of air. A suction pump in the ceiling is kept continually going to draw air from the ground floor.

No less than 6,000 incandescent lights illuminate the Paris Theatre.

On Thursday evening, October 31st, Mr. Charles Urban produced at the Scala Theatre, London, his latest and greatest achievement in "Kinemacolor"--a pictorial record of the most colossal engineering feat in the history of the civilized world, the construction of that wonderful new waterway from the Occident to the Orient, the Panama Canal. Since the American engineers in May, 1904, entered into possession of the canal zone, once a veritable pest-hole, no less than thirty thousand workers have been continuously employed in a hazardous enterprise against which nature herself has fought and has exacted a death-toll of no less than 240 per thousand per year. Graphically and forcefully the films lay bare this wonder of wonders—showing the mighty steam shovels, each of which scoops three tons of stone from the giant ditch at every assault, the drilling, dynamiting and dredging of the cut, the hydraulic attacks hy which mountain-sides are swept away, the gigantic stone crushers, cement mixers, and a multiplicity of novel machinery which man's ingenuity has brought into being for this titanic undertaking. It is the happy helief of the Panama people that they are now the centre of all things, and no intelligent visitor to the Scala can fail to understand why the inhabitants of the Isthmus who have looked on and marvelled at this linking of the Atlantic and Pacific as it has proceeded day by day for the past eight years, can wonder that they hold this opinion; the whole thing is simply stupendous.

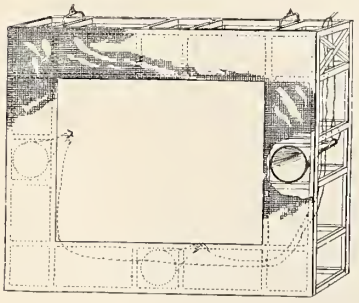
INNOVATIVE

Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Especially for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City



IN the Patent Office there is noticeable improvement in the work done by the Examining Corps—the increased efficiency of this body of highly trained men being undoubtedly due to the material increase of salaries granted by Congress in 1909. Even under the present adverse conditions, all things considered, there is nowhere in the Government service a more competent, intelligent or efficient class of employees than can be found in the Patent Office. Owing to the rigid examination necessary to pass in order to enter the examining corps it is made up almost exclusively of men who have graduated from various technical schools and universities, and they nearly all have a knowledge of the law. Although the increase of salaries checked the number of resignations of competent men, it has not entirely stopped the evil, and further and adequate compensation should be forthcoming in the interest of inventors and patentees, who are the principal sufferers from incompetence.

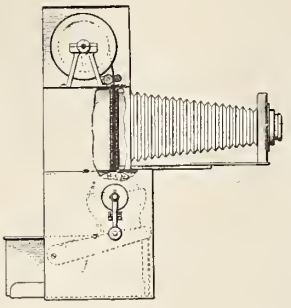
Registration has been granted the Lubin Manufacturing Company, of Philadelphia, Pa., for this trade mark, used July 1, 1909. No claim is made to the exclusive use of the word "Lubin."



Patent No. 1,040,109, to Edward H. Amet, of Redono Beach, Cal., for theatrical appliance. This invention is applicable for use in conjunction with motion pictures, stereopticon views, marionette performances, etc., and its object is to provide means whereby vocal or other sounds supposed to emanate from or accompany motion picture characters, or subjects, may be reproduced with localized effect. The device comprises a drop frame of sufficient depth to carry concealed horns arranged around and adjacent to the visual exhibiting space,—said horns being connected with sound reproducers. Thus each horn may be provided with a telephone receiver actuated by a talking machine through the medium of flexible electrical connections which admit of the raising and lowering of the drop. Of course the synchronism between sound and exhibition is essential to success of a device of this character. The patent claims broadly a theatrical drop provided with a central exhibiting space, and sound reproducers around such space.

The Government of the District of Columbia being vested in Congress, and therefore erethic, may account for the fact that its learned District Attorney recently announced that the sport of smashing straw hats out of season would have to be curtailed for the reason that "If the idea of smashing a man's hat because he chooses to ignore fashion's edict were carried out a man who chose to wear low shoes might have his legs broken."

And reasoning by analogy the "Green Bag" makes the presumption that any old lady who showed herself too decided about matters of costume might be in danger of having her will broken.



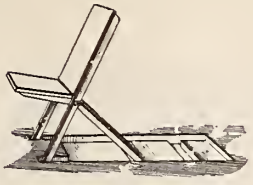
Patent No. 1,040,976, issued to Martin L. Rice, of San Francisco, assignee of Gustave H. Coqeuhniot, of Los Angeles, Cal., relates to duplicating apparatus, and particularly to a photographic machine for making true copies of papers, pictures and the like, directly on paper. One object is to provide apparatus in which the paper is exposed, developed and fixed, in consecutive operations, without necessitating manual handling of the paper. Another object is the provision of means whereby the paper after development is automatically removed from the developing cylinder and delivered face down in the fixing bath. With these and other objects in view, the patent claims the combination with a photographic casing having a roll of sensitized paper in the upper part thereof, of a plurality of plates to guide said paper, a developing cylinder journaled in the bottom of said casing, and provided with a longitudinal groove, a bar in said groove provided with lugs to engage the end of said paper and clamp it in said cylinder, means to operate said clamping means, a fixing tray in said casing, means to remove the paper from said cylinder and deliver it to said fixing tray, a disk to control said removing means, means to control said disk, and means movable in one direction to operate said clamping means and hold said removing means inoperative, and in the opposite direction to release said clamping means, and actuate said removing means.

In Berlin the food inspectors use the moving picture camera in the slaughter houses. Motion pictures are taken of the meat to be examined and then projected on a screen. Moving microorganisms appear on the projected image if the meat is unsanitary. Thus, the art is used to protect as well as to instruct and amuse.

Thomas A. Edison, Incorporated, of West Orange, N. J., has applied for registration of "Home" as a trade-mark for motion picture apparatus and motion picture films, claiming use since January, 1912. We note in this connection that Edison's latest production is a kinetoscope designed especially for the home, with films each carrying three series of pictures; and that Siegmund Lubin has devised a modification of the stereoscope for a like purpose.

Speaking of Edison recalls the fact that he originally had so little confidence in, or conception of, the future of motion pictures, that his failure to take out foreign patents on earlier inventions in that line has involved a loss of many millions of dollars.

There is sound good sense, however, in what "The Old Man," as his army of employees call him, says about patent infringement and the remedy therefor. In a recent interview Edison remarked emphatically, "At present the burden of proof rests on the patentee. Make it rest on the infringer and the problem is solved. In other words, instead of making me prove that my patent has been infringed, make the other fellow prove that my patent has not been infringed. It is simpler, would avoid the endless lawsuits and the burden of proof would lie where it belongs. If the other fellow's patent is worth anything he would be spending his money to some purpose. If it is an infringement, the real inventor should not have to pay good money to prove it. This, moreover, would protect the penniless inventor from having his patents stolen. At present he cannot help himself unless he has the money to put up for legal costs."



Patent No. 1,041,108, issued to William J. Leonard and Fred J. Leonard, of Chester, Neb., is for a disappearable non-obstructive theatre chair which may be folded to a level with the floor in case of fire or other emergency, the object being to render chairs of this class more simple, durable and commercially desirable. The accompanying sketch is a perspective view representing the chair in position for use. The inventors claim the combination with the floor having a rectangular recess therein, the bottom of which is provided adjacent the side walls with longitudinal channels, and transverse channels connecting the longitudinal channels, of a chair comprising a pair of straight standards, a pair of angular standards, a rung pivotally connecting an angular standard to each of the straight standards, a back rigidly fastened to the straight standards, a seat hinged to said back and a rung connecting the rear ends of the angular standards, the forward ends of the straight standards being pivotally connected within said longitudinal channels adjacent their front ends, the last mentioned rung being adapted to engage the rear wall of the forward transverse channel to hold the chair in an upright position, the chair being adapted by spreading the legs, to fold within the recesses to bring the back and seat in the same horizontal plane, and on a level with the floor, the chair standards and rungs being received by the longitudinal and transverse channels respectively.

Argument was made last week before the District Court of Appeals, at Washington, D. C., on the question of the validity of the patents held by the Motion Picture Patents Co., of New York, at the hearing of the appeal taken by the Chicago Film Co., from the decision of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, sustaining the rights of the New York concern.

THE clergy of London are very much exercised over the $100,000 production of motion picture representations of incidents in the life of Christ. A great many of the three thousand ministers to whom the film was recently exhibited were impressed with the realism and the beauty of the portrayal of the wonderful subject, but, nevertheless, the Cockney newspapers have been flooded with opinions for and against what is variously characterized as a sacrilege and as something very devotional and rare. The film runs two days, and is to be a great Christmas attraction. Over forty actors and actresses remained in Palestine and Egypt four months engaged in depicting the scenes on original ground.

An English legal luminary tells of a judge so cynical that when counsel established the fact that at the time the crime was committed a maid was combing the prisoner's hair, held that an alibi was only proven for the hair,—not for the prisoner herself.

The Universal Film Manufacturing Company of New York, N. Y., have applied for the registration of BISON as a trade mark for moving picture negative and positive films, claiming use since May 21, 1909; also for the representation of a bison in connection with "101" Bison, Bison "101" for the same purpose, used since February 23, 1912.

We shall be pleased to answer pertinent questions propounded by readers of the Moving Picture News.

Kinemacolor

Under the command of the Director-in-Chief of the Kinemacolor Production Company, Mr. David A. Miles, the special train engaged for the acting forces on their trip to winter quarters pulled out of the station in Jersey City three weeks ago, and already from the West have come encouraging reports of the work being done by the three large dramatic companies. When the train left New York three sleepers were filled by the company of fifty, which has been reinforced by many prominent actors and actresses who joined the company at various points en route. The train was sent over a schedule that allowed a rest of a day for the entire company at Williams, Arizona, two sections proceeding the following morning to the new Kinemacolor Studio at Hollywood, Los Angeles, California.

From the accepted scenarios which have been accumulating for several months Mr. Miles had picked several to be acted amid the gorgeous grandeur of that Western Wonderland—The Grand Canyon of the Colorado River. The towering heights and the majestic passes, the deep ravines and rainbow-tinted cliffs, formed a background that will make this series unique in motion film production. Of course, the ordinary black-and-white camera would not be able to reproduce the beautiful variations of tint which make the Canyon a mecca for travelers all over the world, but in Kinemacolor every scenic splendor will be perpetuated, and this background to the thrilling dramas arranged will certainly prove a distinct and pleasing novelty to patrons of the fortunate houses which have been able to secure the newly instituted and highly successful Kinemacolor film service. One of the film plays was staged at a place called Turtle's Head, to reach which it was necessary to ride eighteen miles on burro-back along a trail which descended 3,000 feet during the first mile and then zig-zagged back and forth, so that the only picture made that day was one of the sun slowly setting in the West, just as the party reached their camping place.

The pack mules carry tents, which were used by the women of the party, the men preferring an experience in open-air camping. Though they took what they considered plenty of blankets, it was found shortly after nightfall that not a tenth part of the necessary preparations against cold had been made, so it was a very thankful party that greeted the morn. In order to get many of the pictures in the proper way, it was necessary for the camera man to scale cliffs or be lowered down great precipices with ropes. The burro could cling to the very outer edge of the trail with perfect safety, but to those not experienced in such traveling the Canyon held a thrill for every minute of the day. It was necessary to make a start for camp each day at 3 o'clock in order to get out of the awful chasm before dark. Being lost there was a horror no one wanted to contemplate.

It was a tired and peculiar looking lot of men and women who might have been seen a couple of days ago as they hobbled to the station and boarded the train which was to take them to the winter quarters with the rest of the company in California, but they all voted that the work was worth the pains, for in these Kinemacolor releases something remarkable will be given to the public, gladdening the hearts of the worshippers of the Grand Canyon and filling others with the desire to visit this wonderful region.

KINEMACOLOR EXHIBITION OF WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 6

The exhibition given for the benefit of the press on Wednesday of this week was exceptionally interesting. A two-reel drama enacted by English players displayed the adaptation of Kinemacolor to the drama. The title of this picture play is "The Mighty Dollar." Other interesting subjects exhibited were "Canadian National Exhibition at Toronto," "Moths of Asia Minor," "Freshwater Aquarium," "Flower Battle at Nice" and "Strange Mounts."

It will be noticed that in addition to the drama industrial, educational, travel and topical subjects have been covered by Kinemacolor.

GAUMONT

THE PRICE OF PARADISE (Nov. 14).—Evelyn and Raymond are exuberantly happy in their reciprocal love in spite of Evelyn's mother's strong objections to her entertaining the thoughts of marriage with a poor man. The mother has ambitions to see her daughter wedded to a husband of wealth. When Mr. Varnier visits the inn conducted by her mother and shows a strong partiality for Evelyn, the designing parent coerces Evelyn into becoming Mrs. Varnier. Raymond, of course, has his heart sadly rent, and as the automobile wheels away carrying the bride and the bridegroom-elect and the covetous mother, Raymond attempts to stop them, but he is pushed aside.

The bride takes little satisfaction in her palatial surroundings. She is ever dreaming of her loved and lost sweetheart. A spray of iris given to her adds to her dejection by reminding her of the happy past when the lovers gathered them on the sunlit river.

Mr. Varnier is a man of many travels. In the course of one of these journeys he is killed. At the reading of his will it is learned that though he bequeaths all his property to his wife, she will forfeit it if she marries again. It is a hard alternative, but out of the mental struggle comes the resolution to forego all of the luxuries and brave her mother's anger and return to her lover of yesterday. Putting on the rude clothes which she wore the day she left her home to become Mrs. Varnier, she flees from the mansion. By the river she finds the dejected Raymond still mourning the cupidity that had lost him his adored.

Happiness ever after.

THE BROKEN IDOL (Nov. 19).—Mera, her mother and her fiance go behind the scenes at the opera to get a "close up" look at Strombolini, the great tenor. Mera had been somewhat affected by the golden notes of the singer and had felt that life with a man of this temperament would be one long, sweet song. As he sits amid the admiring throng she feels that he is the ideal of her girlish dreams. Strombolini, unhappily, is a much loved man and receives so many letters from adorers that he needs three secretaries to tear them up. How to awaken his love is the problem. She is so much engrossed in the throes of this passion that she flouts her fiance, much to the pained bewilderment of that worthy young gentleman. She finally writes a letter to the singer, which she follows by many more. The tenor, his curiosity aroused by the letters, none of which he had answered, finally agrees to meet her. She arrives at the trysting place greatly excited, her heart beating a rataplan of passion, and waits for her hero. The hero arrives but without a mustache and his 14th century costume and the halo of his high C flat. She does not recognize him. He admits that he is the beautiful tenor, charming prince, the ideal mentioned in her caloric notes, but it is very difficult for her to believe that he can be the great Strombolini. Thereupon, after leaving him, she becomes very melancholy, comes down to a diet of dill pickles and olives and other lovesick feminities, and but for the fact of a good constitution would have wasted away to a shadow. She is still under the hallucination when she receives a picture which shows the tenor in the most unromantic light and which gives six sturdy and very healthy reasons why she cannot marry him, a wife and five children. Whereupon the illusion breaks with a loud report. The fiance opportunely comes on the scene. Business of smiles, kisses and embraces.

EDISON

A THRILLING RESCUE BY "UNCLE MUN" (Nov. 13).—Again we offer an Uncle Mun story with the author, Mr. Fred Nankivel, in the title rôle. Those who laughed at "Uncle Mun and the Minister" will scream this time at the marvelous and impossible stunts he performs. The story opens with Mr. Nankivel's studio in the country. We find him busy drawing a series of sketches. These become animated and go through a performance which mystifies one and provokes irresistible laughter at the same time. While thus engaged he receives a note from the Golf Club urging him to disguise himself as Uncle Mun and play a game of golf with a would-be champion.

He soon arrives at the club house as Uncle Mun, accompanied by Dot, his mascot, and after the usual preliminaries the game begins. Those who play golf as well as those who do not will become interested and laugh to their heart's content at Uncle Mun's impossible shots. While the game is at its height the caddie discovers a house on fire in the village. Uncle Mun, an enthusiastic member of the Volunteer Fire Department, stops the play abruptly and answers to the call of duty. To give the alarm he drives one golf ball after another in rapid succession toward the bell tower, a mile away, striking the bell with the accuracy of a rifle shot. The ringing bell quickly brings out the volunteers. Uncle Mun joins them and they rush to the burning building. There, to their horror, a small child is seen struggling amid flame and smoke in an upper window. For a moment rescue seems impossible, but Uncle Mun, always equal to any occasion, bounds from a bedspring to the upper story and, clasping the child in his arms, he leaps from the burning window to the ground, right side up, with the agility of a cat, and smilingly turns the rescued tot over to its panic-stricken mother.

In spite of the intense excitement Uncle Mun is applauded for his most wonderful and heroic act. The fire is soon subdued and, as usual, the hose bursts and the crowd is drenched.

THE OLD REPORTER (Nov. 15).—Modern business methods seem to prove the necessity of installing young blood into veins of old concerns in order to successfully compete with rival firms, but when this viewpoint is extended to the newspaper game, it is often a failure. However keen and ambitious a young reporter may be, the old fellows, seasoned by years of experience and full of resource, are generally depended upon to "bring home the big story."

The new proprietor of the "Star" discharges two old reporters. Joe Norris, who has worked for the paper thirty years, is one of them. His farewell to his old desk and its fixtures is pathetic but he must make way for a younger man. Even his friend, the city editor, is unable to save his place.

After a week's search Joe lands a place on another paper, but only as a space writer, and with very uncertain pay. He is indifferently told to go and bring in what news he can of the theft of a famous painting from the art gallery.

Arriving there he meets several detectives and newspaper men whom he knows, all bent upon the same mission as himself.

Kean, a detective with whom he has exchanged courtesies for years, tells him there is absolutely no clew. As he makes a few notes his pencil breaks and he borrows a knife of an attendant of the gallery, who is passing. A bit of gilt on the blade of the knife attracts his attention. The frame from which the painting was cut is a gold one; the attendant knew its enormous value. He borrows a small magnifying glass from his friend, the detective, and makes comparisons. The clew is a strong one and he gets his friend's promise to give him two hours' grace to scoop the story should he land the thief.

They watch the suspected man and trail him to a saloon where he meets two art dealers. The detective interests the bartender while Joe watches the trio over the partition of the back room. The painting is brought from underneath the attendant's vest, where it had been wrapped around his body. There is a sensational arrest of the three and Joe rushes off to write his story.

A habit of thirty years is not easily broken and in his enthusiasm over getting the story Joe unconsciously goes to the "Star" office and to his old desk. When the city editor sees him and looks over his shoulder at the scoop, he promises Joe to see that the boss takes him back, for he has done what none of the new regime could accomplish.

CRYSTAL

THE CHORUS GIRL (Nov. 17).—Jack Gray borrows $50 from his friend, the doctor. He gives the doctor his I. O. U. On the reverse side of the card is a message to Jack, from some chorus girl, asking him to meet her at the Chorus Girls' ball. The doctor's wife, while sewing a button on the doctor's coat, finds the card and thinks it is meant for her husband. She determines to disguise herself as a chorus girl and meet her husband herself. This she does, but on her way to the ball her auto runs into a post and she is rendered unconscious. Jack sees the accident and he carries her into his house. She revives and he induces her to take a few drinks. Meanwhile Jack telephones his friend, the doctor, to call at once, believing her seriously injured. When the doctor calls he finds his supposed patient doing a bear dance with Jack. He recognizes his wife in the chorus girl and proceeds to give Jack a very artistic beating. His wife, having gone home, awaits his return, showing him the card as the reason for her actions. He shows her the reverse side of the card with Jack's I. O. U., and serious complications are thus averted.

A very laughable comedy, with Miss Pearl White as the chorus girl in one of her best rôles.

On the same reel:

HER OLD LOVE.—Irene, before being married, was in love with one of Uncle Sam's sailor boys. A few years later he returns, honorably discharged. He sees Irene on the street and follows her to her home. Thinking to surprise her, he enters the house and makes his presence known by kissing and hugging Irene. Just at this moment Irene's mother-in-law enters and sees this lavish display of affection. She runs out to tell hubby. Irene explains to her old lover that she is married and bids him be on his way. Hubby returns and Jack hides in mother-in-law's trunk. She sees him and determines to lock him in. She looks for her keys and Jack gets out. Hubby, still hunting Jack with a gun, comes upon the open trunk. His mother, thinking him Jack, throws him in and locks the trunk. She sits on the trunk to keep him safe and hubby shoots through the top of the trunk, the bullet lodging in her hand. Meanwhile, Jack escapes through the window, and hubby, being let out of the trunk, nearly suffocated, upbraids his mother for falsely accusing his faithful wife.

A clever farce, original in theme, and very cleverly interpreted.

LORD BROWNING AND CINDERELLA (Nov. 13).—Everything is in anticipation at the home of the Widow Gibson. Her two daughters are anxious to make an impression on Lord Browning, who is expected to arrive at almost any moment. Her step-daughter, Cinderella, a beautiful young girl, is carefully kept in the background. While they are waiting, a storm arises and Lord Browning, who is on his way in his auto, is overtaken. The downpour is so intense he seeks shelter in a fisherman's hut, and learns of the Gibson family from the old fisherman. Mrs. Gibson and her two daughters and step-daughter are caught in the same storm and also take refuge in the fisherman's hut. Lord Browning, seeing them approaching, disguises himself in fisherman's clothes. The mother and her daughters enter very haughtily and, not recognizing him, are very patronizing and seem to be contaminated. Not so with Cinderella. She is a friend of the old fisherman, treats him very kindly and enters into conversation with Lord Browning, very much to the disgust of her step-sisters and mother. The next day, Browning, dressed as the fisherman, comes to Mrs. Gibson's to sell fish. He is summarily and harshly dismissed and told to go to the basement door. Cinderella kindly directs him there.

Lord Browning has made up his mind to reveal himself. He returns to the fisherman's home, changes his clothing, and in his machine visits the Gibsons, previously announcing his

Her hrother Fred is fond of her in his rough way and admires her spirit of rehellion. Among the villagers she is a terror and with the school pupils she is idolized as the captain of disorder. Budding into womanhood in her wild ways, Molly comes up against Neil Freeman, the new school teacher: In the first day of school disorder Freeman takes in the situation. He realizes that discipline is the chief need of his over-grown pupils and he also realizes that Molly must he conquered of her rehellious ways. Neil Freeman is a man of determination and when he made up his mind to introduce that element of discipline in his school he meant to accomplish this at all hazards. Being a man of large frame and strength, he really suhdues the hoys by physical force. With Molly it is a different proposition. His knowledge of woman is that they must he handled with gentle firmness. These tactics Freeman uses with Molly, hut as she does not understand them, she laughs. She continues rehellious, stuhhorn, and even revengeful. Her brother supports her in this attitude toward the teacher. This happens when her hrother strikes Neil Freeman senseless in a fit of anger. Then Molly becomes a woman, and so much a woman that she falls in love with the very man she had declared she hated. FRANKFURTERS AND QUAIL (Nov. 17).—The young couple were happy, extremely fond of each other, and the fact that they had very little money made absolutely no difference to them. Their simple, inexpensive pleasures were thoroughly enjoyed, and among the ones that were most memorable were trips to Coney Island, where the Side Show is King and the Frankfurter is Prime Minister.

Wealth came to the man and wife through the unexpected death of a rich relative who had totally ignored them during his lifetime. They now had a beautiful estate, a large circle of friends and plenty of money, but they were far from being happy although they would not acknowledge it.

The solemn butler scared the husband and he loathed the evening clothes his autocratic valet brought him promptly at six o'clock each night. The wife had her troubles, too, for her maid annoyed her, though she did not even care to hint that such was the fact. The couple went to many dreary social functions, met numerous uninteresting people, and were gradually becoming thoroughly wearied of life.

One morning the husband noted in tbe paper that the Coney Island Carnival was on. He remembered what splendid times he had had there in years gone hy, and decided he would like to try it again. The poor man didn't dare ask his wife, the maid made her look so stylish that the husband was really afraid of her, so he left a note explaining that he would lunch at a very tiresome club with a certain dreary individual he named, he eluded the vigilant valet and the grave butler, and "hiked" to Coney Island.

The wife also noted that there were to be doings at the seashore. She yearned to view them, and would have liked to have participated in the merriment accompanied by her husband, but since he wore evening clothes every night she feared he would turn up his nose at Coney Island. So she left a note, telling of a social function, and then made a bee-line for the seashore amusement resort.

Man and wife, each very happy, met while hilariously viewing the parade. There were mutual explanations and mutual laughter. Then they telephoned to their haughty servants that they were "dining out," and proved it by eating "hot dogs" with much relish. Late at night they tip-toed into the house, meekly accepting the attentions of their shocked employees, and guiltily stole up to bed.

But they had such a good time that both agreed it was worth it.

MISS TAQU OF TOKIO (Nov. 19).—He was the only son of an extremely wealthy and indulgent widowed mother. When he returned from college he promptly fell in love with his mother's companion, a girl of no family and no beauty of character. His mother realizing that he would soon repent of a union with such a woman, immediately refused her consent to their marriage, declaring that the boy should not have a penny of her money if he persisted in his resolve to make this low-born girl his wife. When the companion found that a union with the boy would have to be a love match and that the hope that she had entertained of being a rich man's wife would not be fulfilled, she promptly took her departure, intending to continue her search for a rich husband and hoping that next time she would find one whose wealth was all his own and not held in trust for him by a proud old woman.

Believing himself heart-broken, the son started on a trip around the world. While in Japan he was strongly attracted by a little Japanese girl, seen by accident in a tea garden. He was very much in love with Japan and thought little Miss Taqu a charming companion, so he promptly bought her from her father and made her his wife.

Two years after her wayward son left his native land the widow was delighted to hear from him to the effect that he was returning accompanied by his wife and their infant son. He also assured his mother that she need not fear he was bringing an upstart into the family, as his wife was of ancient lineage.

The mother prepared to receive her son in state, gathering together for his reception the friends of his youth. To her horror, he entered accompanied by a hated Oriental (poor little Taqu) whom he sarcastically introduced as his wife. The mother was chagrined, but in the joy of getting her boy back, she excused him even the awful folly of his marriage, and proceeded to enjoy his company, simply ignoring the pathetic little wife.

Realizing that she was detested by her husband's friends and family, and often neglected even by him, little Taqu quietly slipped from the house one summer night, leaving behind her a message that of her own free will and realizing their mutual mistake, she was returning to her people. Her husband, on receiving her message, decided she was right and plunged into a life of gaiety, which seemed great fun after his long absence in a foreign land. But the old friends, the old pleasures, did not seem the same. Constantly before him rose the pathetic little figure of Taqu.

Taqu took up her residence in a little home near Tokio that she had once entered as a happy bride, and there to her one day came her husband, repentant and humble, telling her that she and her baby and their little corner of Japan were more precious to him than all the rest of the world.

CROSS YOUR HEART (Nov. 22).—A little boy, inmate of an orphan asylum, wearied of the life there, ran away. He fell in with an itinerant knife grinder, and for some time happily accompanied him in his wanderings through the country.

The boy had had no home life, no proper bringing up. Right and wrong were all the same to him, and when his companion suggested that they steal some chickens from the hen-house on a farmyard, he did not strenuously object. The farmer was alert, however, and although the knife grinder escaped, the boy was made a prisoner and locked in a closet in a sitting-room awaiting the arrival of the constable.

The farmer had two little children, a boy and a girl. They had gone to bed, but when they heard the excitement, came down to investigate. They were sorry for the tiny prisoner and when father was out of the room, released him. The little girl lectured him on his conduct, made him swear, "I promise never to steal, cross my heart," and then assisted him to escape through a window. When the farmer returned the children gravely told him what they had done and urged him not to pursue the child for he would never be wicked again, and the farmer, who loved his children, consented.

The little orphan, whose childhood was friendless and unhappy, later came into good fortune. A wealthy real estate broker saw him, took a fancy to him, and finally adopted him. The boy, when he grew to manhood, was taken into partnership by his benefactor. One day the firm engaged a new stenographer, and the junior partner did not know the youth was one of the children who had aided him years before. The stenographer, a weak character, took up with vicious associates, squandered his money and ran heavily into debt. Brooding over what he called his misfortunes, he saw a chance to take a sum of money from the safe, and yielding to the impulse did so. Hardly had he left the office before the theft was discovered by the junior partner, who was morally certain that the stenographer was the guilty party. He followed him to his home, and while waiting in the sitting-room for him to appear, noticed on the mantlepiece a picture of two children. He recognized them as the ones who had saved him from imprisonment years before, and on questioning the stenographer's pretty sister, found that she was the little girl who had made him swear to be honest.

When the boy came downstairs prepared for flight, he was shocked to see his employer there. The junior partner, however, did not have him arrested. He explained how he had been given a second chance, and because of it had made good, then to the stenographer he repeated the pledge he had taken in his childhood, "Promise never to steal, cross your heart," and the weak young man with tears in his eyes swore he would make good in the future.

HIS DETERMINATION REWARDED (Nov. 19).—Guy Olliver, a married man, has fallen into the company of a certain Adolp, who lives by his wits and scheming. He induces Olliver to gamble with the usual result of losing. Olliver then begins his peculations from his employer, is caught and sentenced to prison. He leaves behind him a wife and child and dear old grandmother, who nightly pray for his redemption when he shall be released.

His sentence expires. He is back among his wife and family determined to live straight and keep away from the old associates. He secures a position. Adolp discovers him and tries to persuade him back to his old life. Olliver refuses and Adolp begins an underhand persecution. He tells Olliver's employer he has an ex-convict in his employ and Olliver is discharged. Adolp keeps this up till Olliver discouraged of ever getting back into respectability agrees to join Adolp and his gang in a house-breaking job.

They are about to depart upon their depredation when Olliver's little girl comes to the saloon, where is their rendezvous, and begs her papa to come home with her. The good in the man awakens at the sight of his own child. He determines to make one last stand for decency, law and order. Hastily he writes a note of warning to the man whose home is to be robbed. This note he gives his child to deliver to the man who is to be burglarized.

Adolp, Olliver and the men are in the home and preparing to gather up the valuables when the door opens and a shot is fired. The child has delivered the note in time. The owner of the mansion secures policemen and all the gang are captured with the exception of Olliver, who is allowed to go free as a part reward for his act. He is given a position, his determination has been rewarded.

THE BLACK HAND (Nov. 21).—To many people that title suggests a tragedy with pistols firing, knives flashing and bombs roaring, but to those who see this picture, those three words will forever after mean a hearty laugh. Mr. Bodkens reads an account in the paper of different people receiving black hand letters and warnings, to him it is a joke until one of his fellow clerks impresses on him the fact that they really are dangerous and mentions that even he, Bodkens, is liable to receive one.

Bodkens is a trifle nervous when he arrives home, and finding an imprint of a black hand on his door jamb, does not help matters, added to this when he and his wife and four friends, sit down to dinner, and the hand once more appears, this time on the table cloth, his consternation is complete.

The search for the owner of the hand, and the final finding of him, are amusingly shown and must be seen to be enjoyed.

On the same reel:

MOTHER'S BANKROLL.—Mrs. Tompkins decides to invest in a new piano, trading her old upright.

The day the trade is to be consummated, she draws her money from the bank and, fearing to carry it with her on a short neighborly visit, she decides to hide it in the house. Several places suggest themselves, but she makes the kitchen stove her temporary vault.

Papa Tompkins has been using some oiled rags. Taking them to the kitchen he opens the stove and finds the roll. He imagines who has hidden it there and feels that he can find a much safer place. He does, in his daughter's room, in one of her dresser drawers.

Daughter Agnes has received a present that morning by mail. Wishing to show it to her beau, she runs up to her room, opens the drawer, and under the little box finds the hankroll. Rather at a loss to account for its presence there, she imagaines that it is mother's. "Poor place," says she, "I will find a really safe place for it." She does, in brother Billy's room, in a hat on the closet shelf.

Son Billy breaks his hat. Remembering that he has a "hold over" that is fairly good, he repairs to his room for it. He finds the roll, imagines the owner, and decides to place it where it will be perfectly safe, the piano in the parlor.

The piano company sends for the old piano, Agnes allows the men to take it, then leaves with her beau for a soda. Bridget, the hired girl, returns, although it is her day off, builds a fire and Mrs. T. returns to find her depository a blazing furnace. The father arrives, reassures her—money gone—Agnes happens in—she reassures them both—nothing doing—Billy found on the lawn, laughs at their foolish fears, he shows them where it is—not. Then comes the race for the piano, the frantic unwrapping of same when found, and the final restoration of mother's hankroll to her, to the surprise of the piano movers.

INSECT HUNTING (Nov. 22).—This very curious scientific film initiates the spectator into the secrets of insect hunting, so dear to students and collectors. One will be able to follow with interest the hunting of insects in meadows, the hunting for insects on branches by means of umbrellas, searching under stones and in the trunks of trees, on carrion, etc., etc. Then in an extraordinary way, one will learn how to hunt the aquatic insect.

Next some very curious specimens will attract the spectator's attention by their ugliness or ferocity, such as the praying mantis, the chrysomelis or the green beetle, the ferocious carabis and so on. He will be able to also notice the dytiscus (swimming beetles), the enemies of fish culture.

It is very instructive and interesting to behold the voracity of this infinitely small insect feeding on its prey.

On the same reel:

GONTRAN, A KIDNAPPER.— On this day, it is certain that our friend Gontran is unlucky. On turning a street corner, he amuses himself by watching two women who are quarreling over an enormous head of cabbage. One of them carries a child. She abruptly puts it into Gontran's arms, who did not know what to do. The women quarrel until the policemen take them to the police station, and, of course, Gontran remains with the child in his arms. He does not know how to get rid of it. He tries to deposit it in the entrance of a house, but the janitor forces him to take it back. He endeavors to leave the child at the foot of a wall, but the shouts of a policeman remind him that it is forbidden to deposit anything at that place. Seeing a group of policemen, he wants to give it to them, but they are satisfied to take his name and give him back the embarrassing package.

Gontran, discouraged, goes home. He is received by the janitor, who says, "No children in this house." He finally reaches his apartment, where his wife becomes furious because he brought home a child not their own. Meanwhile the infant's mother comes out of the police station and begins a search for her child. She reaches Gontran's home just in time to add her beating to that of his wife. And, of course, Gontran cannot protest. What can he do against two women?

THE INVISIBLE (Nov. 24).—A wealthy farmer, Michu, refuses to allow Tom to call on his daughter Mabel.

Tom notices a "quack" who is selling a powder which makes people invisible. It is even experimented on a farmer in the crowd who, by the means of a trick, becomes invisible. Tom buys a box so he will be able to see Mabel without being seen by Michu. He takes the powder.

On the way to Mabel's house he meets two lovers who, being deeply interested in each other, do not see him. The schoolmaster has dropped his glasses and when he passes does not see Tom either. Naturally he thinks he is invisible. He reaches her home and climbs up a ladder, when the father sees him and tries a pitchfork on his legs. He does not ask for permission to run away.

The two friends have seen everything, and, of course, are laughing. They decide to carry the joke further. When he speaks to them they do not answer, making believe they cannot see him. Disgusted, Tom hopes to find consolation in a glass of wine, and while he is drinking the good friends take the bottle and glass because they do not see him. Tom grows more nervous.

The two jokers enter Tom's house and unload his gun, and take everything which can reflect his own image and wait. Tom arrives. His friends take his money. For a moment, taken aback, Tom jumps for his gun and fires, but of course without effect.

This time Tom becomes real frightened and tries to commit suicide. The two jokers explain everything to old Michu, who laughs heartily at seeing Tom's bag of money. He decides to allow his daughter to marry Tom and they all go to Tom's house. On seeing them, Tom runs away in order to jump into the river, but he only falls into Mabel's arms.

On the same reel:

SEVILLE AND ITS GARDENS.—The popularity of good scenic, educational films is growing by leaps and bounds everywhere. One of our camera men in Spain has secured some wonderfully artistic views in and about the beautiful old city of Seville. Some especially fine views are given of the famous gardens about the city, the Giralda and the Cathedral, the Fairpark and the Alcazar Palace. The photography is splendid.

A COMEDY OF ERRORS (Nov. 20).—Mr. Greeneyes, who is very much in love with his wife, gives her an extra kiss on the morning of his birthday. When Greeneyes walks down the street, she throws kisses at him from the window, and Billy, who lives in the house across the street, thinks that these kisses are for him. When she drops a book to the street, Billy thinks that is an invitation. He accepts it with agility—but learns from Mrs. Greeneyes that the kisses were for her husband—a six-footer with big muscles. When Billy hears about six feet and big muscles, he decides he is wanted elsewhere—so he goes on the jump—forgetting his umbrella.

The husband later returns and sees the umbrella. His wife explains that the umbrella is a birthday gift. Satisfied, he leaves. Later Billy returns for his umbrella, and while in the house, Greeneyes comes back. Wifey hides Billy in a closet, where he almost suffocates, while wifey explains with "fibs" about the gloves hubby finds on the table. A series of comic incidents follow here in rapid succession while wifey explains that Billy is the tailor—until Billy and hubby confront each other, which results in Billy losing his fine fur coat.

All these events give Greeneyes sufficient cause to be jealous—which culminates in a big scene, where hubby upsets everything in the house in his search for Billy. Billy takes advantage of the turmoil and makes off with his belongings, and when later hubby asks for his birthday presents, wifey answers: "Birthday presents, poor hubby, you've had an attack of delirium—there are no presents, but I'll get you some."

THE POWER OF MONEY (Nov. 22).—This story abounds with striking scenes of the curb market and a broker's office during a slump in the market. The story concerns a broker who is in love with a nice little girl. He has a rival. The rival, who is also a broker, plans to "break" the man who is in his way—knowing that the girl will not marry a poor man. Through some of his friends the rival is able to get his opponent to buy certain mining stocks. The plans of his rival are successful and the broker is ruined.

The broker in his opulent days buys, in a jest, a Louisiana lottery ticket. However, he does not keep it very long. In paying for flowers one day he gives the lottery ticket to the flower girl. The lottery wins the capital prize and the girl gets the money. She, however, traces the man who gave her the ticket and divides the prize with him. The money comes at an opportune moment—for with it the broker is able to redeem his losses—and make a little besides—much to the chagrin of his rival. His old sweetheart, who had left him when he lost his money, is now willing to receive his attentions—but the broker does not think much of "sunny day" friends. He is soon able to win the love of the flower girl.

THE SIREN'S CALL TO DUTY (Nov. 13).—Jack arrives to his work at the factory a little late. The master fines him, not believing that the poor man was kept at home by the dangerous illness of his wife. The other employees, indignant at the harsh treatment of their fellow-worker, decide to strike, whereupon they are all turned out. That same evening the master gives a big reception at his home in honor of his wife's birthday. This seems a provocation to the workers and they send an ultimatum to him in which they threaten to burn down the factory if on the following day the siren of the factory doesn't whistle as usual to call them to work. The master is not afraid, he throws away the note, but his little daughter, an angel of beauty and kindness, runs to the factory the next morning, and not fearing the dangers from the desperate strikers, she blows the siren. The workers hear the whistle. They are forgiven. They take the little girl in their arms and bless her.

A MOTHER'S AWAKENING (Nov. 17).—The suffragette's child, left to the care of servants, is not allowed to disturb the busy mother, makes friends with the little girl next door of humbler circumstances, whose mother is too busy at home to belong to clubs. Jennie Smith has some kitties greatly admired by the little suffragette, Alice James. Jennie generously parts with one of her beloved pets, and Alice proudly takes kitty home. Servants are horrified at having the animal in the house on account of germs. When Alice refuses to part with the pet her mother is appealed to, temporarily suspending business. Mother demands the animal shall instantly be removed. Alice slips out of bed at night to sit by her little friend's window to hear the wonderful bedtime stories told by Jennie's mother. Alice decides to write to the editor of the paper and asks him to find her a mother who will tell her stories and let her have a kitty. Writing in her mother's office, hears someone coming, hastily covering letter, escapes. Mother enters looking for some paper, finds Alice's letter. Realization comes to her. Going to find her little girl, sees her slip out, and follows to Jennie's window. Getting some kitties the mother takes them to the little girl's room, and when Alice returns, she finds the mother who tells bedtime stories as well as kitties. Mother and child become happy friends.

THE LADY LEONE (Nov. 15).—The hand of the wealthy orphan heiress, the Lady Leone Mervyn, is sought by her notorious outlaw cousin, Sir Robert Huntley, for his scapegrace son Hal, Sir Robert desiring to secure her vast estates for his branch of the family. The Lady Leone refuses his offer with scorn, but Sir Robert and Hal, accompanied by their retainers, abduct her and take her to their stronghold situated in Glen Huntley, a well-nigh inaccessible spot, reached only by means of a deep gorge which is carefully guarded night and day.

During this raid the yeoman, John Wilde, is killed in pure wantonness by Hal Huntley, and John's son Jack swears to avenge his murder. Jack, in an endeavor to reconnoiter the Huntley fortress, falls into the glen from an overhanging cliff and is rendered unconscious. The Lady Leone, accompanied by the grim housekeeper of the Huntley castle, Dame Margery, discovers Jack, and with her aid resuscitates him. Mutual admiration springs up between the noble heiress and the humble yeoman, and they tell each other their woeful stories, Jack asking to be permitted to aid her in her escape. Dame Margery interrupts their tete-a-tete by announcing the approach of the Huntleys, and Jack is forced to conceal himself. He later, after a hard fought battle with the sentries, escapes from the glen and returns home.

A short time after Dame Margery brings Jack a letter from the Lady Leone, informing him that Sir Robert is dying and insists upon her marriage to Hal, before he expires. Jack immediately goes to her aid armed with a sword taken from one of the Huntley retainers. By means of a clever subterfuge, he gains the interior of the Huntley castle, arriving just in time to interrupt the ceremony. After a desperate fight against overwhelming odds, Jack succeeds in rescuing Leone from the Huntleys and bringing her safely home, although he arrives in a seriously wounded condition.

Some weeks later the Lady Leone, having appealed to the King for protection, is conducted to London by the Royal Commissioners, leaving Jack well-nigh heart-broken.

Jack, unable to bear the loneliness, follows Leone to London, and, being unable to get into communication with her, endeavors to obtain admission to the royal chapel during morning service. As he is being driven away by the yeomen of the guard, the King and Queen, accompanied by the entire court, enter from the chapel. Leone, who is one of the ladies-in-waiting to the Queen, sees Jack and rushes to him and presents him to their majesties. The King, who has, of course, learned of Jack's wonderful prowess in rescuing Leone, is so impressed by his manly appearance that he knights him. The following day Leone and Jack have a meeting in the King's gardens, and Jack, emboldened by his recent advancement, tells her of his undying love and devotion and is accepted. At this moment, however, the King and Queen make their appearance, and the King expresses his displeasure at permitting the wealthy ward of the crown marrying a simple knight, but yesterday a humble yeoman. The Queen in her kindness of heart comes to the rescue and through her intercession the royal consent is obtained.

Leone and Jack, accompanied by their retinue, start for her estates to be married. Hal Huntley, who has managed to keep advised regarding their affairs, attacks them on the road with his band of outlaws and succeeds in capturing Leone. Jack finally manages to cut his way through the Huntley men-at-arms and starts in pursuit, being in turn closely pursued by four of the Huntley retainers. The odds seem all in favor of Hal Huntley, but after a long and exciting chase and desperate running battle, Jack succeeds in routing the retainers and driving Hal at the point of his sword over the edge of the precipice to his death.

Then Leone and her manly Sir Jack arrive at her beautiful home and are happily married, their troubles and trials all behind them.

THE TRIBAL LAW (Nov. 16).—The prologue of the story is laid in the days before the white man came. A young maid of the Pueblos against her father's wishes has eloped with a young Apache brave to his village. The maid's father in his anger leads his tribe to the Apache village to bring her back. He and the young Apache fight and the latter is killed. The maid refuses to leave her husband's body, and the father kills her. Over the bodies of the young couple he registers an oath: Henceforth it shall be a tribal law that she of the Hopi who weds an Apache of the arrow tribe must die."

Each member of the Arrow tribe is distinguished by a circle-arrow mark tattooed above his heart.

The story proper commences one hundred years later, the action taking place in the Hopi country near the Mexican border.

Tall Pine, an Arrow Apache and Carlisle graduate, starts out into the Hopi country with a party of surveyors. As they are encamped in the foothills a night or two later, Crouching Panther, a Hopi hunter, having been bitten hy a rattlesnake, seeks aid from them, and recognizing in Tall Pine another Indian, turns to him. Tall Pine aids him and he departs. The next morning Tall Pine, with his shotgun goes hunting and stumbles into an Indian bear trap, which consists of a large suspended stone, which falls, crushing the hunter's leg. Ravina, a maiden from a nearby Pueblo, hearing his cries for aid, comes to his assistance and takes him to her home, where she nurses him back to health. During the period of his convalescence, a strong attachment has grown up between them, and they are married. After the wedding Tall Pine decides to assume the tribal costume. He does so, thereby disclosing the arrow mark of the Apache tribe. Ravina, who knows the law, begs him to keep it covered. He does so, but not until it has been seen by another Hopi, who had been a suitor for Ravina's affections.

At this time Crouching Panther returns from the hunt and learns that Tall Pine is in the village. He immediately goes to his house. The villagers in the meantime are apprised of the fact that Ravina has broken the tribal law, and start to enforce the penalty. They drag Ravina and Tall Pine to the village, leaving Crouching Panther unable to assist. The squaws stone Ravina, then lock her in a pueblo to await her execution. Tall Pine is tied to a post outside the door. That night Crouching Panther comes to the rescue. From here on the story draws rapidly to a close, leaving the young couple bidding good-bye to their benefactor, Crouching Panther, at the Mexican border.

NESTOR

A WHITE LIE (Nov. 11).—Grace and Dick Spencer are orphans, and the impulsive, generous Dick is held in check by his love for his sister. Dick goes West and becomes a cowboy. Eventually the ranch boss is unable to condone Dick's fits of intemperance any longer and he dismisses him.

Dick drowns his sorrows at a saloon and joins in a game of cards and in a half-drunk condition he makes mistakes, is accused of cheating and ejected from the saloon. He walks mechanically to the nearest horse and is about to ride off when the owner stops him and calls the sheriff. The latter is loathe to take Dick in charge, although he regards him as a nuisance. He therefore orders him to "hit the trail and keep going."

Dick goes, and as he becomes sober he sits down and wrestles with vain regrets and makes resolutions for the future. Bess, the sheriff's daughter, is out riding. She dismounts to pick some flowers and is bitten by a rattlesnake. Dick hears her cries and running to her he kills the snake and cuts around the bite and sucks the poison out. He attempts to carry her back, the horse having run away, but dissipation has sapped his strength and he makes her as comfortable as possible and hastens into town to get help.

The sheriff and some cowboys see the riderless horse and hurry to the woods from whence it came. On the outskirts of the town they meet Dick, who is exhausted and who falls, hurting his hip. He rises as the sheriff asks him where his daughter is, and what he is doing there. Dick attempts to speak and places his hand to his injured hip. The action is misiudged and he is shot by the sheriff.

Dick motions to one of the cowboys and gasps out the facts. The sheriff is overcome with grief at his hasty action, and bidding the boys take Dick carefully to his home, the sheriff rides on and brings Bess back.

Grace is sent for, but does not arrive in time to see her brother alive. Before he dies, Dick freely forgives the sheriff, whom he begs not to tell Grace he was a "bad man." Dick dies smiling and with Bess's kiss upon his lips. The boys all agree that Grace shall only know the good about her brother and are just in time to finish the roughly hewn and inscribed headstone when she arrives.

Grace reads the fact that Dick died a hero, and adds to the numerous wreaths on the newly made grave, and the sheriff tells her that he now has two daughters instead of one.

WHEN CUPID RUNS WILD (Nov. 11).—Florence Sherry, a prominent actress, suffers a nervous breakdown and is advised by her physician to go to the country for a much-needed rest. She heeds the advice and takes up her residence at a small country farmer's. The daughter, Sue, a pretty little girl, is in love with a country boy, Ben, and Ben is devotedly attached to her. A great change takes place with the advent of the city girl. She, to break the dull monotony of the peaceful suburban life, flirts outrageously with Sue's sweetheart, Ben, which Sue resents and swears vengeance on the woman who would steal her beau's affections. Florence learning of Sue's misery and wishing to pay Ben for his treatment of Sue, plans to get even. She loans Sue one of her best dresses, dresses her hair in the latest fashion and teaches her how to carry herself as would befit a lady. She ignores Ben, and he realizing that his chances are with her, tries to ingratiate himself again in the good wishes of his former sweetheart, Sue, for now in his eyes Sue dressed in regular city clothes is far the most beautiful. However, Sue turns a deaf ear to his love making and Ben is ostracized by both the young ladies. At this stage an old admirer of Florence Sherry, Howard Seymour, pays a week-end visit to see her. Florence introduces him to Sue and the three plan to make Ben's life miserable and show him how it feels to be really hurt and jealous. Howard makes desperate love to Sue to the delight of the three conspirators and to the mortification and chagrin of Ben. This make-believe love that had its birth in a joke, soon grows into a budding and lasting affection. The country girl and the city-bred chap really fall in love and are married. Miss Sherry, piqued at the turn affairs have taken, and she in turn wishing to p a y Sue and Ben back in their own coin, absolutely proposes to Ben herself, is accepted and they are married. There are many extremely funny situations, and also a few dramatic touches that make this comedy an unusual one. "Variety is the spice of life," and that trite saying is particularly applicable to "When Cupid Runs Wild."

A PROTEGE OF UNCLE SAM (Two Reels) (Nov. 11).—A woman is found dead in a doorway with an infant child in her arms. The child is sent to an orphan asylum, where later it is adopted by Mr. James Barton and his wife. The child is given the name of Robert, after their son, which they have just lost. The Bartons grow to love their adopted son, but notice even at the age of 12 years his preference for associates of the poorer class. Later Bob is sent to college, where he neglects his studies and associates with the fast set, causing Mr. and Mrs. Barton considerable worry.

After his graduation Bob returns home and is placed in the bank controlled by Mr. Martin, a lifelong friend of Mr. Barton's. Julia Martin loves Bob, but he is indifferent to her, preferring a gay life with questionable persons, which leads him to neglect his duties at the bank. Mr. Martin complains to Mr. Barton about Bob's conduct. Mr. Barton reaches a decision when Bob returns home intoxicated while he is entertaining the Martins. He upbraids Bob and orders him from the room. Julia is grieved at Bob's actions, pleads with him, but he is too intoxicated to take her good advice.

The next day Mr. Barton tells Bob that the best course for him to follow is to go out into the world and make a man of himself. He gives Bob money and good advice which Bob ignores. Bob on leaving home soon gets into the association of evil companions and travels the pace that kills. His money soon gives out and he sinks to the lowest depths and frequents the low East Side dives.

On one occasion his manhood asserts itself when drawn into a fight in an East Side saloon he defends himself heroically. The United States warships arrived in New York harbor for review draw Boh up to the West Side where he is seen by Julia, Mr. Martin's daughter. The girl's great love for Bob asserts itself. She pleads with Boh to change his course. The boy notices the girl's great love and interest, realizes his condition and gives her his promise to brace up. After the girl leaves him Bob reaches a firm resolution. He decides to enlist in the United States navy. He enlists and is later seen on board a warship. His life on board the battleship proves to be the right thing for him, a change is noticed in his condition. Later the boy is given a chance to show his worth. A dangerous explosion is threatened by a leak in one of the pipes in the boiler. Bob volunteers to enter the furnace and plug up the leak after the flues have been removed. The boy is successful in his attempt and a catastrophe is averted. Bob is injured by the intense heat and is removed to the United States hospital ship "Solace." He recovers from his injuries and is given a leave of absence. Bob's brave act is mentioned in the newspapers and is read by those interested in him at home. Immediately after leaving the hospital ship Bob returns home and is given a hearty welcome. Mr. and Mrs. Barton realize that their son has shown his worth and they receive him back home with open arms. Bob, who has long since been aware of his love for Julia, proposes and is accepted.

THE COWBOYS' LEAP YEAR (Nov. 13).—Leap Year on Double-Cross Ranch was ushered in by the cowboys in a very sorrowful manner, as they all felt before the year had ended the widow Maguire would certainly have harnessed one of them into line, as since the death of Maguire, some months previous, the widow in her loneliness had done everything in her power to captivate the admiration of at least one of the boys.

Little Dutchie, a new arrival at the ranch, was warned by the boys of the expected calamity which was to befall one of them. Dutchie had a perfect horror of women and was the most uneasy wretch that ever bestrode a horse. Imagine his feelings when after dinner one day the widow endeavored with her most winning smile to hold him for a few minutes and visit her.

Dutchie looked around for assistance, but as none was in the room and as he was more frightened of her and he would be of a roaring bull, his natural inclination was to grab his six-shooter and make his escape. The consternation of the boys is most amusing when a letter arrives stating that the widow has been left a large sum of money by an Eastern relative. They all make a headlong rush to win her favor, affections and pocketbook, and as Dutchie and two others are tied for the honors and as the widow cannot decide which one she would rather have, she decides that the one that can reach the town first and return with the ring shall be her husband.

Dutchie starts off, but on account of his fat stomach and short legs, he is soon left in the rear, and as they say that all great men are usually small of stature, he must live up to the reputation. He suddenly espies in the distance a man on horseback and, as the rider draws nearer, Dutchie explains his predicament. The rider heartily agrees to help in every way possible, speeds off, secures the ring and by the time the other boys return the minister is giving Dutchie and the widow his blessing. The boys are still wondering how Dutchie got to town first.

THE LIGHTING OF LOVE'S WAY (Nov. 12).—Adolph, a half-witted hunchback, loves a girl who is loved by Miles, a lighthouse tender. She returns his affection. They have a clandestine meeting for her father objects to Miles. This is seen by the hunchback, who tells the father, who finds them together and leads the girl in the house hy the ear.

Miles and the girl decide to elope. They are married in a boat while the father rages impotently on the shore. A month later Adolph cuts the wires and punches holes in the oil tank at the lighthouse, and Miles, the girl's husband and keeper of the lighthouse, finds to his horror that the light will soon be extinguished as holes have been bored through the oil tank. He goes ashore for oil.

The hunchback, who is laboring under a delusion that the lighthouse keeper's wife is held a prisoner by her husband, comes in the house and asks her to fly with him and makes love to her. She refuses to leave and he ties her to a chair. Then he goes up to put out the light. A steamer is seen approaching. Adolph is putting out the light when the wife breaks loose, runs upstairs, and after a fight, she throws him from the lighthouse window and manages to keep the light burning until the ship is safe. Then she and her husband, search for the hunchback and find him clinging to a boat and almost dead. They resolve to care for him in the future.

MAJESTIC

TWO OF A KIND (Nov. 19).—Jane, daughter of a socially inclined mother, hates balls and being dressed up. She wants to become a teacher at a charitable kindergarten under the patronage of some of her girl friends. Her mother will not listen to this, but wants the girl to make a rich marriage. Mrs. Morton, another society leader, has a son, Jack, who runs away from all his mother's balls. She insists upon his coming to one. Jane and her mother, with cousin Vera, attend. Jack is forced to ask Vera to dance, but he makes a bad job of it. Jane, with her scowls, frightens everyone away. She seeks refuge in the conservatory. She sees Jack trying to take Vera around the floor and laughs. Later he stumbles into the conservatory. They are both very shy—and each backs away from the other. Finally Jane's sense of humor gets the better of her and she tells Jack of seeing him dance. They both laugh and get a bit more friendly. Realizing this—they become embarrassed again. Next morning Jane goes on strike and says she will leave home if she is not permitted to go and teach. Her mother—seeing her with packed suit case, is forced to consent. Jane finds her element at the kindergarten. One day by chance she meets Jack downtown. She asks him in to see the work. He goes. At first he is afraid of the kiddies—but later becomes friends with both them and their teacher. Jane's mother, paying a visit to her obstinate daughter, finds Jack and Jane in the midst of a hilarious time in the kindergarten in which they are enjoying themselves as much as the children. Perfectly satisfied, she returns home. A few nights later—Jack summons up courage enough to call upon Jane. Learning that he is to be her visitor she takes her plain dark frock off and changes it for one of the loathed light gowns. In the parlor they have no trouble in entertaining each other. But Jane's mother stumbles in just as Jack is handing the girl a bunch of flowers—and immediately comes to the wrong conclusion. She thinks the two "good pals" are in love. And, excusing herself, she bows her way out—leaving the young pair turned to stone with horror. It is obvious what the mother thought—they both realize why she was so confused. Jane, shame-faced, attempts to explain, but Jack—no longer shy—and not unwilling to let things go as mother saw them—takes her into his hands—and the pals are sweethearts.

ESSANAY

A MONEY? (Nov. 6).—Cal and Billy, two young chaps, turn over their money to their friend, Steppling, for safe keeping, and he promises to allow them a certain amount each day. Next day the two boys meet some charming girls and, not having money enough to entertain them, hurry home and beg Steppling to let them have some on account. He refuses and goes to sleep while they rave. Seeing his clothes on the chair they hit on a scheme, hurry to a pawnshop and pawn the clothes for a couple of dollars. Steppling awakens, finds his clothes gone, and is horrified. Securing a suit much too small for him, he takes some old suits of clothes belonging to the boys and pawns them to get money. This, in his excitement, he drops on the sidewalk. Reaching home he meets the boys, who laughingly tell him about pawning his clothes, then are dumbfounded when Steppling frantically explains that their money was sewed in the lining of his coat. Immediately the boys rush to the pawnshop, but find the suit has been purchased by an unknown party. Returning home they are further knocked out to find that Steppling has also lost the money he got for the pawned clothes. Meanwhile the man who bought Steppling's suit discards it on reaching home, and it is thrown out on the ashheap. A tramp finds it, puts it on, and applies at the house where Cal, Billy and Steppling are doing menial housework to get some money. They instantly recognize the clothes, and the poor tramp is put through a strenuous ordeal as they pull the togs from him and triumphantly wave the recovered money as they kick him out the door.

To Writers:

THE EDITOR

(The Journal of Information for Literary Workers) published in your interest for eighteen years, is the magazine of which Jack London said: "I may not tell a hundredth part of what I learned from THE EDITOR, but I may say that it taught me how to solve the stamp and landlord problems." It is a monthly stimulus to the production and sale of more and better manuscripts. Besides articles of concrete, practical worth by editors or by writers successful or about to be successful, each number contains in "The Literary Market" all the news of all the magazines, new and old, that pay for manuscripts.

THE EDITOR is especially helpful to the scenario writer. It publishes from time to time helpful articles by those who are successful producers of photoplays. A copy of the current number will be sent for 15 cents. The yearly subscription is one dollar.

"MOVIES" GOT THIS SUICIDE

Moving picture operators are awaiting with interest the development of a film taken yesterday near the Statue of Liberty which may possibly detail a maritime drama that was very different from the scenes a moving picture man was trying to take.

The moving picture man went out to make views that would show inland audiences the sights a tourist sees by going on a tug to the Statue of Liberty and back. For his purpose the moving picture man boarded the Immigration Service tug Emigrant. He was getting along fairly well with his pictures when a cry of "man overboard" went up from the ferryboat Manhattan, bound from the Battery to St. George, S. I.

Instantly the harbor craft in the vicinity veered out of their course and there was a general rush of rowboats which had been hastily lowered towards the ferryboat. On the water a black felt hat, a coat, and an overcoat were floating. Passengers on the Emigrant and on the Manhattan insisted that a slender built, smooth shaven man had leaped from the ferryboat into the water and disappeared. Although a close watch was kept, nothing more than his hat and coat ever came to the surface.

Capt. David T. Roach of the tugboat Mutual was the first to reach the floating clothing, although he was followed an instant later by a rowboat from the Manhattan. A search of the clothing resulted in the discovery that it had been sold by a Broadway firm on November 19, 1911. In the coat pocket were 42 cents in change, a handkerchief and an empty spectacle case.

No paper of any kind were found. When the moving picture man was observed aboard the Emigrant there were many accusers who insisted that the suicide was "staged" and that in reality a dummy had been thrown overboard. To these charges the picture man entered a vigorous denial, asserting that the first he knew of the matter was when the cry of "man overboard" was heard. He did his best, he said, to use this sudden opportunity by catching the race of rowboats to the floating clothes and suspected that he had made a very good film.

FACTS NOT RELEASED HERETOFORE

Listed below is a program of four regular releases—two comedies and two dramas—the output for two weeks. The comedies are lively and snappy and the dramas are impressive and forceful. The quality is of uniform excellence. These productions as well as the productions of preceding weeks bear the stamp of the new studio and its wonderful facilities.

A Comedy of Errors

RELEASED WEDNESDAY, NOV. 20

A jealous husband is a comical spectacle, particularly when his wife is above suspicion and when she has a sense of humor. His wife is in a compromising situation and she complicates matters herself with a fabric of fibs until her husband is almost frantic. Billy Quirk and Darwin Karr are the chief fun-makers.

The Power of Money

RELEASED FRIDAY, NOV. 22

This story is of love, jealousy and finance. Scenes showing the operations of curb-brokers are enough to make this a feature. A broker is ruined by a rival and "bread cast upon the waters" returns in a full grown loaf.

The Paralytic

RELEASED WEDNESDAY, NOV. 27

A wonderful exhibition in pantomime. Shows the mental agony of a paralyzed man in the presence of men he knows to have wronged his loved one, yet he is powerless to accuse the guilty.

The Jenkins-Perkins War

The political differences between old Hiram Jenkins and Si Perkins, one a Bull Mooser and the other a Wilsonite, start a feud between the families and separates Billy from Sallie—but "love" finds a unique way and the Jenkins and Perkins war is declared off.

SCENARIO WRITERS

When an author writes a book his name is invariably the asset, and the publisher takes a secondary place. When a composer of music writes a score his name goes down to posterity. When a playwright writes a popular play he becomes well known throughout the whole world of the theatrical profession, who then produce his play. If we take the billboards as a criterion, the director, stage director, musical director, as well as the writer, always receive prominence. Why should not this course be adopted with the moving picture playwright or scenario writer? Why should not his name be published on every film, or advertisement thereof, as well as the director of the play? In my opinion, it would add to the prestige of the scenario writer, to the director, and also to the prominent actors and actresses taking part in the play. It is nothing more than right and just to give this full publicity of the result from the brains of those who evolve the plots, and would do away with a great many heartburnings; then the profession generally would know "who is who" in its ranks. Who will be the first manufacturer to start this system of giving credit where credit is due?

THE FEATURE FILM

It was my province during the past week to see two so-called feature films, and I am wondering what the art is coming to with such mediocre productions as were shown at these theatres. The feature film is a thing of beauty, and should be a feature, not a long, drawn-out foolish plot to pad the program. The feature film is becoming a prominent factor in Cinematography, and the beautiful art as shown by Gaumont, Itala, Ambrosio, General Film Publicity and Sales Company, Great Northern Feature Film Company, The Players Company and several others are worthy of being classed as artistic productions, and as such bring great benefit to the exhibitor who uses them, but some of the so-called educational and feature films are poor in the extreme. One or two companies are springing up to attempt to manufacture these films who know no more about the art or the requirements of the public than the veriest schoolboy. All they think of is getting as many dollars into the company's coffers as they can, and chance the production being good, bad or indifferent, as the case may be. These new directors and companies have failed in the feature field. Is not the time ripe when the manufacturers of the feature film should amalgamate their forces for their own protection, and the protection and benefit of the public, who are a long-suffering people?

VISIT OF MR. NEFF

Through our multitudinous correspondents, with their notes coming from various sources, an error or two has crept through our pages, and a visit of Mr. Neff to New York city brings to our mind an error that crept in one little article, to the effect that, if the suits of the exhibitors against the Motion Picture Patents Company are won, the Independents will benefit. This is an error of a very large calibre, because the Independents are not paying any license fees, and those taking Independent service cannot receive any returns except for the time that they took licensed service, and paid the two dollars weekly, and then began to use the Independent market. Mr. Neff distinctly wants it understood, and we have always upheld this view, that he is not by any means favoring the Independents or the licensed companies. He says: "That we, as exhibitors, take sides of either the Independent or the License or the so-called Trust, only in so far as it affects our business. In other words, we never would advise the use of any kind of film service. The fight that is now going on is in defense of the exhibitors, to secure their rights and relieve them from a condition, to say the least, which is, in our opinion, destructive to the best interests of the exhibitors, and the business in general, namely, two dollars license fee a week, and the discontinuance of service without notice. We believe that all makes of films should be run by an exhibitor if he so desires, regardless of any source whence opposition may come. No manufacturer or film exchange should be allowed to dictate to an exhibitor whether he should run Independent or License films, and this is all the exhibitors ask for—a square deal to all with special privileges to none.

HELPS IN THE DARK ROOM

For some time past I have been watching the results of the development from each factory and have been surprised at the non-uniformity in color, tone and development of the film. It is a well-known fact that the Eastman Kodak Company makes an emulsion, even and uniform, and with proper manipulation the resultant work, either as negative or positive, should be practically the same, if their formulæ are carried out according to the instructions given in their text-books. I think the most beautiful part of the work is that of the developing room, where the various chemicals can be watched in all their details and the beautiful effects of the image growing upon the film. It is a most interesting study, and if the developing hands would take pride in the results I think a great improvement on some of the pictures I have seen could be made. Various makes of film are on the market, and it is hard to find a standard developer for all of them.

One of the greatest aids to getting this universal developer can be obtained in a booklet published for 50 cents by the Berlin Aniline Works, and edited by Geo. L. Barrows, termed, "The Agfa Book of Photographic Formulæ." While this treats on general photography for dry-plate development, I think much good could be obtained therefrom suitable for films, and I am indebted to Mr. Barrows for the following developers for Cinematograph work:

GLYCIN DEVELOPER

Distilled Water, 60 gallons.
Sulphite Soda, ½ pound.
Carbonate Soda, 2 pounds.
Glycin, ⅛ pound.
Time, 20 minutes.
Temperature, 70°.

and the well-known

METOL HYDROQUINONE DEVELOPER

Water, 66 gallons.
Agfa Metol, 1 2/3 ounces.
Agfa Hydro, 2½ ounces.
Sodium Sulphite (Crystals), 3½ pounds.
Potassium Carb. (C. P.), 1¾ pounds.
Potassium Bromide, ½ ounce.
Dissolve in half the water hot; add balance of water cold.

In my experiments with one or two tests I found the above to work very satisfactorily and several brands of film were used.

The Lumiere people give for their film the following stock formulæ:

NEGATIVE DEVELOPER

Hot Water, 6 gallons.
Lumiere's Methynol, 1 ounce.
Hydroquinone, 2 ounces.
Sulphite Soda (dry), 32 ounces.
Carbonate Soda (dry), 32 ounces.
Bromide, 360 grains.
To develop take one part stock to two parts water, temperature 65° F.

POSITIVE DEVELOPER

Hot Water, 6 gallons.
Lumiere's Methynol, 1 ounce.
Hydroquinone, 2 ounces.
Sulphite Soda (dry), 32 ounces.
Carbonate Potass., 12 ounces.
Bromide, ½ ounce.
To develop take one part stock to one part water, temperature 65° F.

They, in their instructions, make very good suggestions, which I have often carried out in my experiments, both with dry plates, film and Cinematograph films—namely, soaking the film for five minutes previous to development in a solution containing one pound carbonate soda (crystals) to every 16 gallons of water. It is astonishing what good results are obtained with any make of film or plate by using this solution. I will be glad to get the experience of my readers regarding the results they obtain by the various developers used, and in a short while I will give results of experiments and a formula that has never yet been given to the public—one that has been in active use for the past twenty years with very little variation in the results obtained.

HAZEL KIRKE

Majestic Two-reel Feature

There is something of more than passing interest about Majestic's first attempt at a feature subject: firstly, the accurate and splendid manner in which the artists participating in the making of the picture handle their individual roles; and secondly, the pleasant reminiscence attached to the play itself.

"Hazel Kirke," written by Steele Mackaye in four acts, was first produced more than thirty years ago at the Madison Square Theatre, the accurate date being February 4, 1880. The play ran until May 31, 1881, making a record of 486 consecutive performances. Among the cast playing it at that time appear the names of Effie Ellsler, Thomas Whiffen, Mrs. Thomas Whiffen, Eben Plympton, and others well known to the older theatre-goers.

The story of the play runs as follows:

Old Dunstan Kirke, the miller, gets into financial difficulties and is about to lose his mill when Squire Rodney comes to his rescue. Hazel Kirke, the miller's daughter, is fourteen years old when Rodney takes an interest in her and sends her away to be educated. She returns a a beautiful and accomplished young lady. The miller, out of gratitude, promises her hand in marriage to Rodney, but Carringford, a handsome young fellow whom the miller saves from drowning, falls deeply in love with Hazel and she returns his love, but is determined to keep her word with Rodney and her father. Rodney learns of her love for Carringford, and upon learning that Carringford is a nobleman and that his intentions toward Hazel are honorable, releases her from her engagement. The miller, however, receives a letter from Carringford's mother telling him of her son's infatuation for Hazel, and asking him to help her break up the attachment. He considers Hazel dishonorable and, without listening to her explanations, drives her from his home and disowns her.

Carringford marries Hazel but his mother, who has set her heart upon his marriage to Maud Wetherby, is taken seriously ill and he is compelled to keep his marriage to Hazel a secret, for fear the news will kill her. Hazel's relatives and Rodney think that Carringford has deceived Hazel, and it appears that through a mistake the marriage is not legal under the laws of Scotland, where the principals reside. Carringford is about to have another marriage ceremony performed to right the supposed wrong, but his mother appears on the scene with Rodney, who has told her of her son's position, and tells Hazel that Carringford has wronged her. Hazel, believing the story, leaves without seeing her husband, and the death of Lady Carringford keps her son in ignorance of the reason.

Hazel wanders away alone. Even her devoted companion, the poor orphan boy, Met, loses track of her and goes to her old home to look for her, but all that is known is that Lady Carringford was found dead and Hazel gone. Carringford searches for her, broken-hearted, and her poor old father, who has gone blind, is not told of her flight. He is about to lose the old mill again for debt, and the door of his heart is still closed to Hazel when she comes back home. Rodney offers her his name once more and she consents to marry him if he will gain her father's forgiveness. He pleads with the miller while Hazel kneels close by, unknown to her blind father, who denounces her again. She rushes to the mill stream and seeks to end her life in the raging waters. Her father learns too late that she has returned, and hearing her scream as she throws herself into the water, goes raving mad. Met goes to Hazel's rescue, but they are both drowning when Carringford discovers their danger and brings them safely to the shore. Hazel is returned to the arms of her loved ones, her marriage to Carringford is found to be legal, and the miller, whose reason is restored, receives her once more as his daughter.

This famous drama has been staged for the Majestic Motion Picture Company by Oscar A. Apfel, with the following cast:

Hazel Kirke.....Mabel Trunnelle
Dolly Dutton.....Virginia Westbrook
Emily Carringford.....Isabel O'Madigan
Mercy Kirke.....Margaret Gray
Dunstan Kirke.....E. P. Sullivan
Aaron Rodney.....Paul Scarden
Pittacus Green.....Harry Frazer
Barney O'Flynn.....Doc Ranson
Methuselah Miggins...Master Robert Tansey
Clara .....Ethelyn Herman
Millers, Servants, Etc.

The splendid way in which the work of this particular picture play has been carried out, the smooth and natural manner in which player plays to player, makes it exceedingly difficult to single out any one individual as excelling the others in mode of interpretation, but it is certain that E. P. Sullivan lined himself into the role of Dunstan Kirke in a manner that left nothing to be desired.

LILLIAN BERRY

That motion picture work is sufficiently strong in attractiveness in affording relief from the continual travel besetting the theatrical profession is shown by the increased numbers of deserters from the ranks of the legitimate. Among the latter is Lillian Berry, who will be remembered by her clever characterization of the ingenue role in "Doctor De Luxe," and her work in support of William Gillette for two seasons, and in stock houses in Boston and Seattle. Miss Berry, who is now prepared to join some motion picture stock company in the vicinage of New York, is no stranger to motion picture work, she having played leads and ingenue roles with the Western Biograph Company.

A GIRL FROM THE COUNTRY

Eclair's release for November 26, "A Girl from the Country," is a mighty good object lesson for those who insist upon judging others by generalities.

The chief concern of this story is about the preconceived idea of the young city chap toward all or anyone from the country. He is one of the most self-satisfied, self-confident individuals, who, when he once forms an opinion, is of a cock-sure sort as to its truth, and even on realizing he is in the wrong, he still insists in pretending to be true to his first hasty conclusion, though it be at the cost of many a pang of internal suffering.

Such a character is played by Mr. George Larkin. This is the first time we have seen Larkin in a straight lead and his work is quite commendable.

The "girl" from the country is played by a Miss Augusta True, whose face seems new to your critic, but she is good—I wouldn't mind seeing her again.

Miss Julia Stuart is just as good in this as she is in everything—which means perfect.

Following is the story:

Teddy Airfield, a young business man, has received a letter from this country friend—a former college chum—to the effect that his sister is coming to the city and would Teddy, in memory of their college days, entertain the girl during the time she was in the city and allow her to make his home hers for a few days. This, Teddy is not particularly inclined to do, for the last time he had seen the girl—five years before—she was just an ordinary country girl; but he cannot refuse his friend, so he writes that he'll entertain the girl.

He then communicates with three of his friends, telling them of the girl's expected visit, and asks if they will entertain her as he is too busy to do so. He promises to foot the bills.

The boys promise, and, feeling quite a "wise guy," Teddy goes to meet the girl. He is amazed—she is beautiful. He is now very sorry he has made such arrangements for the girl and tries to break the engagements and 'phones the boys. But they refuse to be released. Teddy is very much provoked, and getting up from the desk on which the telephone is placed, accidentally leaves upon it his diary in which he has written the engagements (and which he has finished with "And I take Alice to the train—good riddance"). Alice, wishing to telephone, chances upon the diary and reads the entries; she is pleased until she reaches the last entry—then becomes very much provoked. She thereupon determines to punish Mr. Teddy. So on the first night, when Jack calls to take her to the theatre, she is most stunningly dressed, purposely parades her beauty before Teddy, and is especially sweet to Jack.

The next day Harry calls to take Alice joy-riding. They start off, Teddy following them, unseen. When they stop for lunch, Teddy, still on their trail, is discovered by Alice, unknown to him. Immediately the girl is especially sweet to Harry, and when they return she enthuses greatly over the trip.

When the boys call to present their expense bill for entertaining the girl, she overhears them, and after they leave she upbraids the disconsolate Teddy for his behavior. However, after Teddy has been properly rebuked, she—oh, well, what's the use of trying to describe the action of two young people at such a time? What would you do yourself?

MOVEMENT ON FOOT FOR ORGANIZATION OF FEATURE FILM MANUFACTURERS

With regard to an announcement in the advertising columns of this week's issue of our magazine, of a conference to be held at the Hotel Astor, New York City, on Thursday, November 21, rumor has it that the feature film manufacturers have awakened to a knowledge of their needs, and that the proposed conference is being held with a view to protecting the feature film manufacturer, and to the facilitation and general betterment of the feature film trade.

The idea is to organize and, in a sense, concentrate their business interests in so far as the marketing of films is concerned, and to lessen the individual expense of advertising, etc.

As we understand matters, each manufacturer is to share equally in the stock interests of the organization, the stock to be paid for in cash or out of future profits, according as the manufacturer may desire.

It is supposed that by so organizing for the betterment of the whole the manufacturer may gain a more definite idea of what his profits are to be on each individual production, and it will also place within the power of the organized feature film manufacturers the means of placing on the market the best that money and art combined is able to produce without the tremendous individual strain under which feature film manufacturers are working at the present time.

ITALA SPECIAL FEATURE HAS REMARKABLE ARTISTIC AND SENSATIONAL PROPERTIES

The Itala Film Co. some little time ago opened a branch office under the management of Harry Raver, who is now being ably assisted by Mrs. C. Lang Cobb in New York City. From this office a special line of feature films is being offered to the public—states rights propositions that are well worthy the consideration of exhibitors and those whose business it is to handle the exclusive rights of special subjects

During the past week a very remarkable production two reels, entitled "A Living Man's Tomb," was shown to the press. This film is now on the market, and we can commend it most highly to all and everyone as a states rights proposition of the highest value.

The dramatic and emotional talent displayed by the leading lady in this production is something remarkable, and long to be remembered. The manner in which she enters into her story is a delight to the intelligent and artistic onlooker.

The young woman in the story has two suitors. Unlike other stories of its class, the villain is lacking—both men—and in fact all of those connected with the tale being of the highest integrity, so far as can be seen, with the exception, perhaps, of the father of the young woman, whose ideas of marriage are founded principally on pecuniary matters.

With the idea of arranging for his daughter a marriage of wealth and position, he scorns the offer of the poor suitor, and incidentally the one whom his daughter loves, intercepting at the same time a letter from the young man to his daughter, in which he has told her that he is going away to make his fortune, and will return in five years to her.

The daughter hearing nothing from her lover, thinks him faithless, and therefore marries the rich man, with whom she lives on a fairly happy basis, until one evening at a fete her former lover suddenly appears on the scene. He manages to hand her a note asking for an appointment to meet her alone. A day or so afterward, her husband going away to spend the day, she arranges a meeting with her former lover at midnight on the veranda of her home. When he finds out from her, by accident, that she has never received the letter he wrote to her, he is so overcome that he swoons; and she, thinking that he is dead, drags his body out of doors, down the steps and across the grounds, and throws it into an oubliette, opening above an underground passage. In the bottom of the oubliette is a deep pool, or stream of water. When the young man strikes the water he revives, and after twenty-four hours of entombment there, is in despair and exhausted.

Meantime the husband arrives home bringing with him two visitors. When it is proposed that they visit the old oubilette, the wife on hearing this becomes terror-stricken for fear that the body will be discovered, and goes at midnight again, lantern in hand, to remove it herself. Upon arriving at the pool through the various underground passages and opening the door leading to it, she is terribly frightened, thinking as he steps toward her alive, that it is a ghost she sees. The scene where she flees back again, her thin light draperies floating in the half light with him in pursuit, trying to tell her that all is well, is most effective. She swoons at the entrance of the house and is taken within by her husband and his friend. She is ill for some time afterward, but no one ever finds out why she was found in that condition on the veranda steps that night. A note received from her lover tells her that he is safe, and asks her to try and be happy and to think of him no more.

The scenic touches of this film are beautiful. The sets inelaborate, and it is indeed one of the most pleasing feature films that we have recently seen.

At the same time with this production there was exhibited one of their regular releases, "The Horror of Sin," for November 25, in which the same actress does quite as remarkable work as she has done in the feature film.

The American branch of Itala shows signs of making a name for itself as a headquarters for splendid feature subjects which can always be depended on.

OUR WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENT

WASHINGTON, D. C.

The arrest of J. Boyd Dexter, manager of the Maryland Theatre for showing what was considered by policemen of that beat an indecent film, has caused no stir in motion picture circles here for the reason that Mr. Dexter's reputation in both the exchange and exhibitor business as a stickler for clean, educational and uplifting films is too well known not only in Washington, but in a wide territory in this vicinity, to which he at one time served films. The public seems to have rightly judged that the officer in authority was overstepping the mark in a difference of opinion between decency and indecency and that Manager Dexter was in the right. It appears that the policeman did not accord the manager the usual courtesy of a friendly suggestion "to cut out that film," but seized the reel and arrested Mr. Dexter, who paid a collateral of $50 that night for appearance in court.

Now, it was expected by some that the matter would quietly blow over, but Mr. Dexter will not be so easily appeased. He means to fight the matter to a finish, even to the point of trial by jury and a higher court if necessary. It is reported that the attorney for the police department told Mr. Dexter that he was taking the matter too seriously and that the theatre manager retorted that to him it was a serious matter, hat he had his own reputation, that of his theatre and of his family at stake, with such a charge as showing an indecent film.

The picture under discussion is a comedy in which some ladies are shown bathing in the latest style of skirtless bathing suits, merely as a pastime, in a minor action of the story. It is the Thanhouser release of "Petticoat Camp," and everyone knows how high this manufacturer stands for uplifting, entertaining, artistic films. The costumes are said to be no more abbreviated than those of various women swimmers that have appeared in films recently or even on the local theatre stages.

The film will be given a private exhibition to the police authorities and several others, for judgment, and the outcome is awaited with much interest.

In speaking to Mr. Dexter on the subject he said: "Though the police look upon this as a trifling affair, to be lightly treated and smoothed over, to me it is a very serious matter. To accuse me—a man who is called cranky at the exchange—who time and time again refuses a film on account of there being a slight suggestion, or an immoral tone, that was not the best for my young patrons—of showing an indecent film is a grave charge. Owing to my several years' connection with the exchange business, I was in a position to fight for clean films, and Washington has the reputation of being too particular in its film selections. You can't be too particular. A good part of a man's reputation is built upon the house he keeps, be it his home or his theatre.

"The exhibitors of this city have been too long subject to the arbitrary opinion of policemen, many of whom do not stand very high in education or culture. It is about time something were done to inaugurate a local censorship. The exhibitors want it and would welcome it. They would know where they stand. Perhaps this will bring out its necessity. But I mean to fight and fight hard."

It might be well to add that Mr. Dexter is the first man who braved—and it meant bravery when he began—an independent film exchange in this city under the Craft Film Exchange. He built up quite a patronage in Washington, Baltimore and the nearby states of Maryland, Virginia and North Carolina. Later he was identified with the Washington Film Exchange, rising to managership there. Then he returned to the sign painting, which had been his business before becoming an exchange man, and a part of the time while in that field. His posters are seen before many of the picture houses, and are noted for their artistic make-up and terseness of expressions describing the films. Recently Mr. Dexter has assumed the management of the Maryland, which is noted for clean, educational, uplifting pictures. "It isn't the cost of anything that bothers me," says Mr. Dexter. "I want to give my patrons the best in picturedom.

THE BROKEN IDOL

By VIRGINIA WEST

(Adapted from Gaumont Release)

MERA VROMAN stood before her mirror with flushed face. Her hands trembled as she raised them to arrange her hair.

On the bed lay an evening gown, and the dressing table was strewn with all the necessities of the feminine toilet. The girl was going to the opera. But that was not all. She had been to the opera many times, but to-night—to-night she was to hear Strombolini.

But even that was not all. Mera knew one of the women in the chorus who had promised her that if she would come behind the scenes she would give her a close view of the great tenor.

So that was the cause of the young lady's excitement. Although engaged to be married, Mera had carried in her heart, for some time, a deep, secret adoration of Strombolini. From her two-dollar seat he seemed to be the ideal of beauty and perfect manhood. "Oh, he must be like the heroes he represents," she had said over and over to herself. "He must be or he could not act and sing so gloriously."

And now that she was to see him close—perhaps even to look into his eyes—well, the agony of suspense was almost too much for Mera.

She was very quiet during the opera. Most of the time she leaned back in her chair with dreamy eyes and glowing cheeks. Now and then, at some particularly stirring passage she sat forward, almost rising from her chair, and clasped her hands upon her breast.

"My dear, try to control yourself a little," whispered her mother, never guessing the real meaning of the emotion.

"For heaven's sake, Mera, what's the matter with you? Anybody would think that Dago had hypnotized you," said the fiancé.

For a moment Mera shot daggers at him from her eyes. Then relaxing and sinking back into her chair, she breathed, "Perhaps he has, who knows?"

The young man spoke one word under his breath with much vehemence. "I wish you'd see him on the street. He probably looks like a dressed-up iceman."

"I shall see him after the next act," said Mera triumphantly. "I know one of the ladies in the chorus."

The young man snorted.

"My child," said the mother, "you cannot go to such a place alone."

"Such a place!" exclaimed the indignant Mera. "Why a place frequented by Strombolini is sacred."

Jack looked pained.

"Won't you go with her, Jack?" asked Mrs. Vroman.

"Oh, it's just the place for me. I should be honored but I fear my sacrilegious feet could not be permitted to touch upon such holy ground."

"Don't be silly, Jack," said Mrs. Vroman. "I'll tell you! We'll all go behind the scenes. Won't that be nice, Mera?"

"I shall go," said the girl languidly.

The curtain dropped on the last act. Almost before the final notes of the orchestra had died away Mera was on her way to the elevator. Her mother and Jack followed as quickly as they could.

"Be patient with her, Jack, and act wisely," said the prospective mother-in-law. "This is a crisis. If you make an unwise move you may wreck both your lives. Mera's young and foolish but I think she really loves you. If you love her you must help her over this silly infatuation."

"I know you're speaking wisdom, Mrs. Vroman, but it's a mighty hard task for a fellow."

"I know it is," answered the mother, "but promise me you will be wise and be gentle with her through this. She will soon be disillusioned."

Jack breathed a sigh that reached his shoes. "I give you my word," he said, "that I will do my level best."

The member of the chorus met them just inside the stage door.

"Come with me," she said in a mysterious whisper, and led them behind a back drop to a space opposite the door of a waiting room. Then, still whispering, she said, "There."

Mera looked with all her eyes. There in the midst of an admiring crowd of women stood Strombolini. He was still dressed and made up and bewigged as he was on the stage. His arms were filled with the flowers brought to him by his admirers. To Mera he was the picture of perfect manly beauty.

"Oh thank you, thank you," she breathed tensely, turning to the kind lady friend. "How can I ever tell you how grateful I am? And yet," she sighed to herself, "there are so many who love him."

That night there was little sleep for Mera. Hour after hour she tossed about. The wonderful voice of Strombolini sounded in her ears and the picture of him as she had seen him being honored floated before her eyes. She wanted him to receive love and homage, and yet jealousy was gnawing at her heart. She felt sure that those other women did not worship him as she did, and yet they could be close to him and she could not. Oh, how could she get an introduction to him? She did not know, but she must think of a way.

When morning came Mera arose, pale but determined. To her mind there was but one way; to write to her idol. If it had been any other man in the case she would have recoiled from such an idea. But with her hero it was different. He would realize that she had simply been an instrument of Fate, used to bring about a meeting that had to be.

So after much agony of mind the note was written and mailed.

"I cannot address you, for I know no title great enough," it began. And then in words few but eloquent, she told him that it was necessary for the perfection of both their lives for them to meet.

"For," she said to herself, it is not possible for such a love as mine to be unreciprocated."

In a terrible suspense Mera waited for the answer to her note. It did not come. "Something has gone wrong and he has not received it," she told herself, and wrote another.

During the second period of waiting the love-lorn girl refused to leave the house or to see anyone who called—even her fiancé.

A week passed and no letter came. Another was written and sent to the tenor. After three days an answer came. It said simply:

"Name the place and I shall meet you."

Mera hastened to name the most romantic spot she knew of in the park, and the time of meeting. No place was good enough, of course, but she did the best she could.

When the day came she refused all food. Her mother thought she was ill and sent for a doctor, but before he arrived Mera slipped away to the trysting place.

She was much too early but waited with throbbing heart and eyes anxiously watching every passer-by.

At last a man approached her. She knew that it could not be he so she turned her back.

"Is it Senorita Vroman?" asked a voice at her shoulder.

"Yes," she said, and turned slowly around. Then, "I beg your pardon, but I believe there must be some mistake."

"Is this not your note? I came at your bidding."

"You are—you can't be Strombolini?" she cried breathlessly.

"And why not?"

"Are you the beautiful prince—the hero?"

"Oh, yes. You did not recognize me without my make-up. Many do not.

"But you are not so tall, either, and you are fatter."

The man laughed. "Well," he said, "you see, I wear very high heel shoes on the stage and my costumes make me look thinner."

"You—you are very different," said Mera slowly.

The man had a florid complexion and coarse sandy curls. His hands were wide and the fingers short and thick. Yes, Jack was right. If he let his beard grow for a day and changed his clothes he might easily be the iceman.

"And it was really you who sang three weeks ago to-night?"

"Oh, yes, and I was in good voice that night—I remember. My voice was beautiful." He seemed perfectly unconscious that he was praising himself, but he completely forgot Mera in his enthusiasm over his own voice.

Mera, still hoping for she scarcely knew what, raised her eyes to his face and said in her tenderest voice, "It was three weeks ago to-night that I first saw you close."

"Then you got a good look at my costume," he said in a loud tone, "I am glad you saw me in that. I look well in that one. Don't you think so?"

Mera nodded.

"Well, what did you want to tell me? I must get to the opera before it is over. There is a new tenor on and I want to hear him."

"I—I—don't believe I can stay any longer now—I—feel faint," answered Mera weakly.

"That's too bad. I'll get a taxi and take you home,"

"Oh, no, please don't go with me," said the girl quickly. "Call a cab but let me go alone."

When the man had put her into a taxicab she took his offered hand and looked into his eyes for a moment. Then she whispered, "Won't you send me your picture?"

He promised that he would and Mera leaned wearily back against the cushion.

If tradition of pickles being a diet for love-sick or disappointed maidens were true, Mera would have easily consumed a barrel in a few days. The shock to her sensibilities upon the occasion of the unveiling of her idol was more than severe. She knew that its feet were indeed made of clay, but she could not forget the beauty of it before she lowered her eyes.

The thought of the picture cheered her to some slight extent. She determined to enshrine it upon an altar and there worship in memory of that which might have been. She would never marry. She would remain the bride of her ideal.

The mail was watched anxiously until at last a thin, hard package came. Mera took it to her room and knelt before the shrine she had prepared. Flowers and candles were there, waiting.

"My loved one," she whispered as she took off the last wrapping, and then in a loud voice cried, "Oh!"

In her hand she held a picture of the man she had met in the park, a woman and five children. "Oh," she exclaimed again, and threw the flowers and candles out of the window. The picture she broke into small pieces and threw into the fire.

"I think it has reached the end," whispered Mrs. Vroman to Jack that night when he came around as usual to inquire.

"Then hadn't I better see her?" he hastened to ask.

"Emphatically no!" said Mrs. Vroman. "You must wait until she sends for you and then act as though nothing had happened. I know Mera."

As we forecasted three or four months ago, the Frohmans, Shuberts, Belascos, and the rest, are becoming actively engaged in the moving picture business. Daniel Frohman gave an interview to a New York newspaper the other day in which he asserted that leading actors and actresses would pose for the pictures before very long. Eva Tanguay, star in the Fields' latest production, flew off the handle in Pittsburgh recently, and the best theatre in Cleveland filled in the cancelled time quite nicely with the Bernhardt "Queen Elizabeth" pictures. Would such an action have been taken two years ago? It would not.

Kalem's "From the Manger to the Cross" is meeting with no clerical opposition west of New York. It was feared that the Cloth would strenuously object to the "Life of Christ" being shown in the moving picture theatres. We have not heard a word of criticism up-to-date from prominent clergy in the Middle West. The moral standard of the moving picture reaches a climax in this Kalem production. Presented with dignity and reverence, and with true Biblical adherence, this film story will at once interest and silence the opposing minority. The film will lead to a revival of sacred history for one thing. The only essential detail in proper presentation of this great picture is that exhibitors handle the programme reverently and in good taste. Dignified advertising and a true atmosphere in the theatre should not be overlooked. Care should also be observed as to the musical programme.

It has been noticed during the past few months that picture theatre patrons in the Central States are demanding programs containing topicals and industrials. There is great need of the convincing story humanizing great industries such as farming, shop work, manufacturing, etc. These pictures should be true to life and convincing. Everyone wishes to know what his neighbor's life is like and whether the trials and tribulations incident thereto are similar to his own. Within another year the quiet, convincing drama will come into its own and the one thousand feet film, now a commercial asset, will be changed to the film conforming to the appropriate length of the story it seeks to tell.

We wish to compliment the World's Best Flm Co. upon its release of "Pilgrim's Progress" in four reels. The picture as an educational, to our mind, is quite as important as the "Passion Play," Dante's "Inferno," and "The Odyssey." John Bunyan, author of "Pilgrim's Progress," wrote his masterpiece while in prison. The work is a classic in English literature and this film should revive interest in the great book which is only second to the Bible in the lessons it seeks to teach. Christian's burden will never be lifted for many, but the load may be lightened, and the Giant Despair vanquished, through the lessons that such pictures as "Pilgrim's Progress" inculcate.

"The County of Monte Cristo" is the way in which Selig's great feature is advertised by an Indiana exhibitor. It is enough to make Dumas turn over in his grave.

Cleveland has the first double-screen theatre. The Oxford, recently opened, is actually two theatres in one. Described by Mr. R. P. Stoddard, there are two picture curtains, two picture machines, and two shows are run simultaneously. A person may visit the theatre and for a single admission see two shows. Sitting on the right side of the theatre one screen is in view, and when a complete program has been shown it is only necessary to move to a seat on the opposite side and see an entirely different set of pictures. The house is a novelty, but its success does not come from that alone. Late special releases and first-class pictures are shown and no unsightly bill-boards mar the entrance to the Forest City's latest playhouse.

The weaknesses of many Dickens pictures are that the characters lovers of Dickens have longed to see visualized do not stand out convincingly. This is not the fault of the actor or actress, but of the director, who, perhaps not a Dickens student, has failed to appreciate the fine points of characterization so essential to the success of the works of Dickens. Dickens for a time was a clerk in an attorney's office and with his limited experience as a law reporter he had an astounding conception of legal characters and customs. Dickens introduced almost forty men of law into his various romances and each is a distinct type of the legal fraternity. We would like to see a Dickens picture play where some of the characterizations are finely drawn. There is Serjeant Buzfuz, Dodson and Fogg, the low shyster type of Sampson Brass and the bland, dignified Lord Chancellor. Uriah Heep, the sly, oily villain, always humble, and Mr. Kenge, of the firm of Kenge & Carboy in "Bleak House." Mr. Tulkinghorn is one of the malignant types of Dickens' lawyers, and a good type of the criminal lawyer as Dickens saw him is Mr. Jaggers in "Great Expectations." He always insisted upon the categorical answer "yes" or "no" as he bullied witnesses and he washed his hands with scented soap! We want to see these minor but important characters thoughtfully enacted on the screen.

In visiting a moving picture theatre, it is almost as interesting to listen to the remarks made by people in the audiences and to study their expressions as it is to follow the pictures. In almost every city and town there are many young people who worship their "picture heroes" and they are plainly disappointed if his or her image does not appear in the pictures. Some refuse to attend unless their particular favorites are billed. The questions asked and answered in the moving picture magazines prove that the matinee idol has been supplanted by the moving picture play idol. The actors who pose in the pictures should appreciate the little testimonials sent them personally or which appear in verse in the monthly magazines The compliments come from the heart and are certainly sincere. We were in a picture theatre the other evening when a crowd of young girls entered. A certain popular actor was billed to appear. When the actor first in the character of a wealthy banker's son, and riding in a touring car, was shown there were many exclamations of "Isn't he just too dear?" and "Say, Kid, don't you suppose his dad has heaps of money and I'll bet a nickel he owns that car himself." When the hero was sent to prison the girl enthusiasts were much grieved, one stating audibly that he was "too dear and good looking to wear that horrid striped suit." The boys and girls of Filmland are loyal to their favorites in Pictureland.

ENTHUSIASTIC RECEPTION OF JOHN BUNYAN PICTURES AT ACADEMY OF MUSIC, BROOKLYN

On Sunday afternoon, November 10, an exhibition of the Hochstetter Utility Company's production of "The Life of John Bunyan" and "Pilgrim's Progress" was given before the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences in the huge music hall of the Academy of Music.

The auditorium was not only taxed to its limits on this occasion, but many were turned away. It is estimated that at least a couple of thousand people viewed this remarkable film production on that special occasion. The most intense interest in the pictures was shown by almost every individual of that vast throng of people, gathered together as they were to criticise as well as admire.

And although it was a largely critical body of learned and well-informed people who sat so silently through the five long reels of wonderful dramatic action, and as wonderful photographic effects, there was evident an atmosphere of entire satisfaction.

The musical portion of the program was very ably conducted by G. Waring Stebbins. Mr. Stebbins' selections were chosen not only as a fitting accompaniment to the pictures, but in such a careful manner as not to offend the most ultra-religious individual who might be there.

One of the noticeable things in connection with the production of "The Life of John Bunyan" and "Pilgrim's Progress" is that the scenes in which the Christ appears are presented in such a beautifully delicate and reverent manner that that portion of the product calls forth only the highest praise. On the occasion in question when the Christ, so wonderfully characterized by Clifford Leigh, appeared in the picture you could have heard a pin drop; not a word of dissent was audible in that great throng of people who had come to say the worst as well as the best.

On account of the number of people who were unable to gain admittance at the Academy on Sunday afternoon, and also because of the splendid impression created by the pictures, it has been decided to repeat the presentation on several future occasions in the same auditorium, the dates of which will be given later on.

And not alone this, but the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences have thought well enough of the production to secure the exclusive rights for exhibition in Brooklyn. After the exhibition, the company were warmly congratulated by Dr. Franklin W. Hooper, managing director of the Institute of Arts and Sciences.

ROMAINE (LUBIN) FIELDING

Romaine Fielding, the deputy-sheriff-director, who was recently appointed at Prescott, Ariz., was complimented by Sheriff Charles Keeler upon his early attention to duty. He was notified that a forger was in Prescott and they wanted him, but were unable to locate him. Fielding turned him over to Deputy-Sheriff Joe Young the afternoon of the same day he received a description of the man wanted. Fielding picked up his man while taking a picture from a description given him. After taking the prisoner down and turning him over he returned to his quiet and peaceful vocation of making picture plays. The citizens of Prescott, the "Mile-High" city, have nicknamed this director "Go get 'em Fielding," because he never fails in anything he undertakes. He doesn't know the words fail or quit.

PICTURE MUSIC

By ERNST LUZ

In using a repertoire of music for picture playing, you will find your march numbers, regardless of the way you place them, to be the most neutral of all numbers used and they will more effectively accompany descriptive or introductory scenes during which heavy or hurried action occurs and, as a rule, if you use them when male characters predominate, you will find that many opportunities will present themselves whereby you can tone these numbers, making the picture action more effective.

In playing war pictures, in which very many consecutive and lengthy battle scenes occur, such as in my plot of the Kay-Bee release, "When Lee Surrenders," in this issue (for in this picture the battle action runs 700 or more feet of film), you will find it useful to change from your battle music or hurry at intervals to a heavy military march, this giving the picture a more melodious setting, for it must be remembered while the picture demands effective music, it should at the same time be entertaining.

The waltz is another number that can be termed a neutral number, although it is the most flexible number in a temperamental sense of all numbers used, which has made it very popular in picture playing; in fact, almost too popular, for it becomes very tiresome to hear just 18 minutes waltz and then 18 minutes more waltz, etc.

You can easily rid yourself of the habit of continually waltzing with the picture if you use in descriptive or introductory action wherein the plot or picture action shows male character predominance a suitable march or two-step, and when you follow a female character use the waltz. This will not only create a necessary change of tempos in picture playing, but you will find that when toning is required you can do it more effectively. To explain more fully you will find in following a female character lead that, at any moment she may lead you to a romantic or sentimental situation, which has no direct bearing on the plot, and quite often is stock acting used to create length (for every film must be about 1,000 feet when released), in such a case you would find it difficult to tone down a march number effectively, while with the waltz it would be a very simple matter.

There can be no doubt as to the waltz necessity in picture playing, for it is always pleasing, and with a little care can be made very effective for many scenes of entirely different setting. In waltzes you will find those that are only good for neutral or descriptive playing, such as Strauss waltzes or similar ones requiring accentuated playing to give them a good musical rendition and they should not be used for any series of scenes during which romantic or sentimental love scenes occur. For sentimental effects the modern waltz, or what is often called a dreamy waltz, is the better, and is known by its sustained movements, all of them being legato or slurred.

The Waldtenfel waltzes are all very good for this kind of playing, for while they are old they are standard and the kind that last. The two kinds of waltzes here mentioned should be selected in major keys with possibly short relief movements in minor. Waltzes predominating in minor keys of the legato type can be saved for more serious setting, and by toning they can be made to even cover short, pathetic or plaintive situations effectively. The Oriental waltz when played slow and legato has a very appealing effect, and you will find it simple to play it to give a 6/8 andante effect, in which tempo most plaintive minor numbers are written. So you can readily see that while the waltz in descriptive and accentuated style will cover lively action (not heavy action), by having a variety in your repertoire you can also tone it down to plaintive action, which is the most serious temperamental requirement excepting that of the dirge or funeral chant. Other than these you have the characteristic waltzes of which there are many; the Oriental waltz, played in strict waltz tempo being one that you will find necessary in pictures of today. The Spanish waltz or fandango, is another very necessary number for meeting the present picture's musical requirements. The Valse Lento is always a good number for sentimental setting wherein the sentimental action continues and is not broken into, for it is never a good number when played heavy, and will only allow for a slower or more serious tempo if required, making it not effectively responsive to toning. The concert waltz is not essential to picture playing, although it can be used in pictures of classic and court intrigue as a pivot number when using old master's compositions or a classical set-up for the picture, remembering that it should accompany introductory or descriptive action. The galop can be easily placed, for it follows only one line of action, which is a chase.

Another good picture playing number is the caprice, which, being very flexible as to tempo, makes it valuable, and it also can be easily placed.

You will find in all pictures a certain point usually after all characters have been introduced and described where, if the sub-title or leader does not tell you plainly, the action will inspire you with the fact that something will soon happen, that a plot is to be created, or a mystery solved, and by placing your caprice at this point you will find yourself playing an excellent number for any toning that may be necessary, remembering that where the female character is necessary to the action to use a caprice predominating in legato movement, and for the male one of staccato movement. The fact that the caprice usually contains many triplets of simple technique alone, makes it possible to give it a hurried effect, and as it can be played very slow or fast, always remaining a good musical number, it excellently portrays this kind of action, which quite often leads up to a necessary dramatic number.

All other numbers, commonly known as concert numbers, can be classed into the three effects, viz.: Sentimental, pathetic and plaintive. The sentimental may be a reverie, tone poem or any of the many titles used, but in determining the proper number it is only necessary to remember it should be a slow number of dreamy sentimental effect and always in major key. The pathetic also is a slow movement and is more effective in minor key. These two numbers should be of pleasing theme to be effective, while the plaintive does not necessarily need be so. The plaintive number is always a minor. The funeral march or dirge and chant or similar numbers come under this heading. The sentimental action can be termed as that of love, deep thought, regret, wherein a character is relating a sad experience or in playing through descriptive scenes in pictures of the simple life, containing little action. Pathetic numbers are always necessary to portray death scenes or scenes wherein a character is suffering from an injury, either moral or physical, which has been undeserved. The plaintive are such scenes showing great misery, processionals to execution, funerals and burials.

All the numbers I have mentioned and their placing are meant for the modern drama or melo-drama, and in following my plots you will see that for comedies and descriptive or scenic pictures, I use a medley or popular setting, knowing as I do that the public demand the popular or so-called rag-songs as well as the standard, therefore, by using some thought you will find that you are not ragging every picture, but playing to please everyone, and at a time when they are in the temperamental mood to be pleased by what you are playing.

MUSICAL PLOTS

By Ernest Luz.

A few rules governing their use.

The cues given will allow for natural ending of strains, unless "Leader" cue, in which case a quick segue should be made unless otherwise stated. Avoid Overtures and Potpourris in their entirety; each picture creates its own selection or potpourri. The cues are so stated as to give you both a prompt and direct cue. You are safe in making segue as soon as you are positive of your prompt cue. Avoid introductions to numbers unless otherwise stated. Avoid the shading of numbers as printed, an even mezzo forte being the best. From this you can get both pp and ff shadings with effect according to the demands of picture action. When shading is positively essential you will find words "Tone to action." Avoid the use of books. They are not practical for setting-up. In playing numbers following a certain line of action drop to pp in case there is a cut-in of flash scenes. For playing recopy plots legibly on large paper and fasten by clasp to right of music stand or piano. Read the Film Stories in this magazine as it will familiarize you with the cues. Studio projection would allow for material improvement in set-ups. We are always ready to hear from you and explain any difficulties you may have with these plots or otherwise. If personal reply is requested enclose stamped envelope.

A CLEAN KNOCKOUT AT WHITE PLAINS, N. Y.

November 11, 1912, will go down in the history of the picture operators of New York as a holiday, or a day of rejoicing, that is, to the members of the Moving Picture Operators' Union of New York No. 1. Charges were sent to the Central Labor Union in White Plains, N. Y., by the Spot Light Workers' Union Local No. 35 stating that one Robert Goldblatt was operating a picture machine at the White Plains Electric Theatre who held no union card, nor recognition certificate of any kind, and a demand that the Central body of that jurisdiction shall take immediate action and send word to the theatre that Robert Goldblatt is not a union man, that he be immediately discharged and a union man of Local No. 35 be placed to work in his stead.

These charges were read to that Central body last week and it was decided to notify Local No. 35 or its representative, also Robert Goldblatt, of M. P. O. Union No. 1, or its representative, to appear at White Plains before that body at their meeting, November 11th, and that both sides shall be heard before action would be taken.

The M. P. Operators Union No. 1 was well pleased with this procedure, as the members were very anxious to have a hearing before such an intelligent body of men and appointed a committee along with Representative Knaster to take up their cause. The committee appointed were Vice-president James Daisie, Sam Kaplan, Mike Berkowitz, Al. Mackler, to act with the business representative and President Robert Goldblatt. Local No. 35 was represented by Harold Williams and Wm. MacVey. Brother Kelly, of the Stage Electricians' Protective Union No. 1 was delegated to take the place of International President Shay, of the I. A. T. S. E., and represent Brother Shay at White Plains, owing to the fact that the honorable president of I. A. T. S. E. had to be present at the Rochester convention of the A. F. of L.

At 8 p.m., November 11th, the meeting of the White Plains Central body was called to order by the chairman, and all concerned were present. The case of Local No. 35 versus Robert Goldblatt, of Operators' Union No. 1 was declared open for discussion before the body. Brother Kelly, acting for President Shay, explained his mission and the regret that Brother Shay could not be present. Harold Williams, of No. 35, was the next speaker, and he remarked that he did not come to place the old family trouble of the auxiliary and the mother Local No. 35 before the body, but he simply wanted to have Robert Goldblatt, the president of Operators' Union No. 1, taken from his job at the Electric Theatre, declaring him non-union, and that a man of Local No. 35 be placed on that job.

The writer is very sorry that he must remark that Mr. Williams, No. 35, was a very poor speaker, and his remarks had very little bearing upon the minds of such intelligent men as were seated at the meeting of the White Plains Central body.

The next speaker was Brother Goldblatt, who did not speak to defend himself, for there was no reason for defense, nor did he try to defend his own position at the Electric Theatre. He simply stated the true state of affairs that existed during the entire career of the ex-auxiliary and its former mother, Local No. 35, which most every one in the country by this time is familiar with, and would take up too much space in this issue. His line of talk was well taken by the body and lasted fully thirty minutes, though he tried to make it as short as possible so as to give others a chance on the subject. The next speaker was Business Representative Ralph Knaster, who corroborated the statements of Brother Goldblatt and, addressing the Central body, stated:

"Mr. Chairman and Brothers:—This is so important an event I beg your attention for a few moments and allow me the few words I have to say. I came before your body this day to corroborate the statements made by our worthy Brother Goldblatt. I am here before you representing 371 hardworking, intelligent men to make you familiar with affairs as they exist this day. I daily visit theatres in New York City, and the tactics used by members of Local No. 35 are disgraceful. My men employed at the various theatres try their utmost to carry out the will of organized labor, to live up to the labor laws of the American Federation of Labor, and do their utmost for the uplift of the working man, and are true and loyal soldiers in the rank and file of the army of organized labor. We do not discriminate against the members of No. 35 that are working in theatres in our city. We recognize them to be the same union men as we are; we do not try to oust them from their positions, as they endeavor to do to us here in your jurisdiction. But, however, I wish to make you familiar with the tactics Local No. 35 is using against our men. At an East Side theatre known as Thalia Music Hall the Union Variety Acts of Local No. 5 were locked out and scab labor was employed. I had called my operators out in sympathy with the actors at their request. Mr. Cogut, the representative for the actors, notified Harold Williams of No. 35 and was promised that no operator from No. 35 would be sent to work there. But the following day a member of that union named Ed. Richney, working card No. 123 of the union, was on the job, and after sympathizers got this man away from the job, another member of Local No. 35 was seen on the same job by Mr. Cogut, of Local No. 5, and Mr. Cogut, of the Actors' Union, gave this second man his (Cogut's) card, told him to return to Mr. Williams of Local No. 35 and he would straighten out the matter, as that house was a scab house and the operator was actually scabbing on the job, which will be verified hy a letter I will read to you gentlemen if so permitted."

There were no objections and the letter follows:

New York, Nov. 8th, 1912.

Mr. Abe Cogut,
Variety Actors' Union No. 5.

Dear Sir:—On October 28th, 1912, I was under contract to work at the Thalia Theatre, 236 Broome Street. You came to me and told me there was a strike in said theatre at that time. I was willing enough to make place for your man, and when I demanded at least one day's pay for my trouble, disappointment, carfare, etc., you said you would see that I got it from the union. There and then I took your word as a man for it, and now two weeks gone by I seem to be forgotten. You told me to see our representative, Mr. Williams, and after receiving my working card as a union member was advised by Mr. Williams to see you again about this, but I don't know when I can meet you, so I write to you whatever I want to say. In hope you will make good your promise and get the pay I am awaiting your answer.

Respectfully, S. STIBBE,
Member Local No. 35, M. P. Dept., working card No. 203.

"To continue with my story, gentlemen, you can readily see the tactics used by No. 35. This man knew a strike was on but demands money for his few minutes, or what time he was there, scabbing on that particular job. Mr. Cogut did not guarantee him his pay, but told him to inform Mr. Williams if there was anything wrong to call at the office of the Actors' Union and matters would be patched up. This man did not make room for Mr. Cogut's man, as he states, for Mr. Cogut's man was one of the actors locked out and the operator was not an actor by any means, and as for the union operator that worked there steady, there was no need of making place for him as he was already off the job on account of the struggle. So there is the kind of work which is being done by the local that filed the complaint against Robert Goldblatt.

"Furthermore, Mr. Williams, in his address, stated that his local was being assailed in the newspapers, and I wish to state that I am the editor of the chat column of that particular paper, and that any item which I place in that column can be verified on demand. I don't wish to take up your precious time, so I close with a few remarks that it would take volumes to explain everything that I would like to, so, therefore, I will end my address and thank you greatly for giving me this long-looked for opportunity."

The next speaker was Al. Mackler, who also verified the statements of Brother Goldblatt that the very men considered disorderly by Local No. 35 are now members of that Local No. 35, also one who was expelled from the auxiliary for scabbing and other crooked work is one of their members.

Brother Sam Kaplan was the next speaker, and he explained how the boys of the former auxiliary were ready and willing to help the cause of organized labor, and all about the Fox strike, paid all taxes and never flinched from their duties as union men.

Brother James Daisie was the next speaker. His address to the body was very short, but to the point. He showed his union spirit to such an extent that the body greatly applauded him.

This ended the hearing and the body went into executive session to decide what was to be done in the case.

At 10:30 p.m. a decision was rendered, and it was stated by the Central body that by a unanimous vote no action will be taken against Robert Goldblatt and that he could work at the Electric Theatre at White Plains as long as he pleased, and thus justice was served by the intelligent men who formed the Central body of White Plains.

A great victory for the Moving Picture Operators' Union No. 1 of New York.

In the case of this issue I am giving to the operators an idea of organizations, the benefits of them and what they are really for. Organizations date back as far as one can only think, and, in fact, since the very beginning of civilization. In the olden days, when the Pharaohs ruled in Egypt, there was an organization of Egyptians, a body of men called slave-drivers, that were formed for the object of getting as much work out of the unfortunate slaves, and accumulate as much wealth for the owners as possible, which was, in their estimation, the betterment of their (the slave-drivers') conditions. Another organization was formed of the slaves under the leadership of one to whom we owe much for the laws given to all mankind, and that was Moses. He was successful in hettering the condition of the slaves by leading them from bondage. After the reign of Titus another great organization sprung up under the name of Christianity (the New Era), under the leadership of the Saviour. This was and is a great organization for the benefit of bettering conditions of humanity, educating the human mind and leading its constituents on the path of prudence and virtue. And so on there are many kinds of organizations for various benefits. The farmer, the manufacturer, the merchant, the laborer, the mechanic and many more organizations are in existence for various reasons. Now, going into the moving picture industry, the film manufacturers have theirs to hold up—their prices, the exchanges, to regulate the rental prices, the Exhibitors' League for the benefit of their conditions, and now we come upon the man behind it all, and that is the moving picture operator.

There are two organizations, one the Spot Light Workers' Local No. 35, the other is the Moving Picture Operators' Union No. 1 of New York. Now, the question arises which one of the two is the best one to join, and which will give you representation, the best protection in time of strife, and protect your rights in cases where employers refuse the payment of schedule; also many other rights which you are entitled to, too numerous to mention. I advise all operators to get into an organization, for where there is union there is strength, and one individual cannot accomplish anything. An instance, if you should take a toothpick which is very thin, a little child or infant could break this with ease. But if you took five hundred or more and bundled them together, tie them tightly, they are united into one, and it would take a man with superhuman strength to break that unit bundle, and so it is with the workingman. Get together brother operators, bind yourself to a unit under one constitution, all for one and one for all, then it will be pretty hard to overcome your strength, your demands will be met and you will always remember this little poem:

United we stand
Divided we fall.
Union forever
Equality for all.

Now, you would like to know which organization to join. My advice is to join the Moving Picture Operators' Union No. 1 of New York, as it guarantees you all rights and representation for all taxation. This you cannot expect to get if you join the Spot Light Workers' Union Local No. 35, for that is the reason several hundred men were forced to organize the Union No. 1 of New York, because Local No. 35 would not grant them equality and the right to govern themselves and violated the rights that should be given to men that are far superior in craft to them, and the word Union itself means equality, and if one should join such an organization, he would be going in with a body of men like the Egyptians of Pharaoh's days or become a white slave-driver, taking your tax and enriching an organization that pretends to give you something that they cannot or will not give. To tell you that you will get all rights in Local No. 35 would be telling you an untruth, so if you want to be on the right track get in line with the rest of the boys and apply for membership in the ranks of the only dependable mechanics and operators, and that is the Moving Picture Operators' Union No. 1 of New York. But remember that joining an organization is not the only thing you must take into consideration, you must at all times be loyal to your obligation and the regular payment of your dues is another important thing, for you must have funds to live, likewise an organization must have funds to exist, for there are many things that must be bad and paid for such as meeting halls, employment office, a representative to look after business and many other expenses. In the chat of the next issue I will give a little more space for such matters, as there is not enough space in this issue to place all that I would like you to know.

Business Representative and Editor of the Chat.

According to the N. Y. American, for the first time in the history of the stage moving pictures are to be employed as a "local atmospbere for legitimate drama. Charles Frohman has commissioned Paul Potter, the dramatist of "Trilby," to construct a four-act drama in which sixteen scenes will have the additional action supplied by the films.

The localities dealt with in Mr. Potter's play, the scenario of which has been accepted, are London, Bombay and Calcutta and New York. The pictures will be employed only in the second and third acts, and sixteen of the scenes will be shown through this medium. These scenes will be entirely in colors. It is understood that the new play owes its inspiration to Kipling's Mulvaney stories. The title is "On the Road to Mandalay."

SPLENDID TRIBUTE TO THE MOVING PICTURE

Rev. Herbert A. Jump, pastor of the First Congregational Church, of Oakland, Cal., recently addressed the classes in education of the University of California in the following manner:

"This new force has entered into the conditions of modern educational power of modern life," said the Rev. Jump. "No student of social conditions can afford to be ignorant of its power.

"Of every twenty-three persons you meet on the street one has been attending a 'movie.' Five times as many people patronize the film theatres as attend the regular drama. Every hour a new film is published.

"This is the latest in the series of inventions which has made human history. It has transformed the existence of the moderately well-off wage-earners. It has doubled his opportunity for clean fun.

"You now have your Shakespeare reeled off a spool, and human life taught at the end of a crank. One travels over land and sea without leaving one's seat and sees the great personages of the world perform their mighty deeds. We unconsciously derive knowledge of life and the world which makes a difference in our entire viewpoint.

"The scenes of cruelty, vice, brutality, makes it easier to believe that the world contains cruelty, vice, brutality. The scenes of human love, of heroism, make those acts easier. As to the moral standards of the picture theatre they are quite as high as those of the public library."

Nearly every member of the Dauphin County Medical Society was present at the Academy of Medicine, at Harrisburg, Pa., on the night of November 6, to hear the illustrated lecture given by Dr. T. H. Weisenberg, a professor at the Medico-Chirurgical College, of Philadelphia. Dr. Weisenberg spoke entirely on nervous diseases, and with his lecture showed life motion pictures of various diseases taken of patients brought to the General Hospital of Philadelphia for treatment.

Dr. Weisenberg is the only man in the medical profession who has ever used a moving picture camera for medical purposes, and during the evening nearly 25,000 feet of film were reeled off. The pictures plainly showed the different expressions on the patients' faces and their action while suffering with a nervous attack. Prior to the lecture a short business session was held and at the conclusion a smoker was given in honor of Dr. Weisenberg, who is considered one of the most learned men in the medical profession.

So. Bend, Ind.—A new moving picture theatre will be opened up by John G. Berschiet, of Aurora, Ill.

Cincinnati, O.—A new moving picture house has been formed here, Lehman, Meiss & Co.—Gerke Building.

Birmingham, Mich.—La Verne Lavanseler, of Royal Oak, is building a moving picture show on the Poppleton property.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

THE ORDER OF OPTIMISTS

BECAUSE our space is limited we have not touched on that great Optimistic Order lately. President Van Buren Powell reports chapter meetings in all sections of the country. The Order was primarily founded to combat the plot-stealing-favoritism-just-as-good-as-the-others wail, but there is another side to optimism that all good optimists should not overlook. Here's the ritual:

> Let your writings inspire hope, instead of fear; faith instead of doubt; smiles instead of tears; love instead of hate; charity instead of selfishness.

If all picture playwrights of this country would get that sermon into their systems and practice it there would be much less trouble and fewer failures in the field. The man or woman whose writings only inspire fear is almost without influence. Now, we do not wish to leave the impression that it is necessary for the author to appear cowardly to write without honest conviction or naturalness. We mean nothing of the kind. But the great mass of the people who patronize picture theatres, the toilers of this old world who produce the food and the clothing for us, who build our houses and run the trains upon which we ride, and who gather together from the four quarters of the world the goods which we demand; the mothers and fathers of the next generation of useful citizens; the patient teachers in the schools, and the physicians and the clergymen—oh, there are so many people about whom there is so much of commendation to be said. To give these toilers a bright, uplifting picture play—a story of inspiration and encouragement—a touch of joy and of optimism—there, indeed, is a field for the picture playwright and the director. Remove the tares and the thistles, and plant the seeds of sunshine. There are too many picturepleys written, and too many picturepleys produced depicting the sordid and the dark side of life. Write the optimistic story, brighten the atmosphere of the picture theatre, or, in other words, doff the sackcloth and ashes.

REFLECTIONS OF A CRITIC

A critic in the Photoplay Magazine writes he took a straw ballot among picture theatre patrons and he claims that the result was "overwhelmingly in favor of showing the casts on the screen and plenty of titles." We agree with the critic as to the cast and we disagree with him anent the "plenty of titles." (He probably referred to subtitles or leaders.) Of course, the public favors plenty of sub-titles in those plays where the action is so complicated that "plenty of titles" are a prime necessity for understanding. The point is to write and produce the play where the continuity of action is such that "plenty of reading matter" is unnecessary. In the same issue of the magazine, Mr. A. W. Thomas writes authoritatively upon the subject of sub-titles as follows:

> "A picture that is telling in its effect is far more desirable, in fact, it is preferable, to a sub-title. It is a difficult thing for a new author to write without resorting to 'leaders,' and yet if he learn to put his plots together without them, he will be making a reputation. But if sub-titles must be used, make them terse and effective, the shorter the better."

Here is just another case of the man who has written successful picturepleys having the better in the argument of practice over theory.

THE "SCHOOL" QUESTION

Pictureplay department editors of the News, World, Photoplay Magazine and Mirror have been directly or indirectly lambasted recently because of their attitudes long since taken against the so-called "schools" for picture playwrights. In nearly every case the defense of the "schools" has been made by writers who, so far as we know, have never sold a script. The editor of this department has not attacked these "schools" and 'institutes" and "associations" from selfish motives. He has been conducting his department for the benefit of the writers and not only the News, but other trade journals, have lost many hundreds of dollars' worth of "school" advertising because of their stand against the "school" and for the interests of the script writer. The News has returned the copy of a half-dozen "institutes" within the past year. We endeavor to be consistent. Without exception, the editors who have been scoring the "colleges" are men who have been and are successful in selling their scripts. They have also had access to about every "course" of "instruction" now advertised and sold. Seldom does a week pass without a "lesson" being received from some aspiring author with a request to us to explain this or that assertion, or accompanied by a complaint. We have many letters on file from readers who express regret at time and money lost in conning over the efforts of impractical theorists who would teach an art in which they are not themselves proficient.

By the way, among the letters we have received from editors who condemn the "schools," one just at hand from L. S. McCloskey, editor for the Lubin Company, is particularly gratifying. It is certainly encouraging to know that the responsible editors are doing what they can to assist the trade journal editors to combat those things believed detrimental to the script writers. The promising author has no better friend than the much-maligned editor. Take it from us, that this is gospel truth.

LIKES AND DISLIKES

Editors are partial to certain kinds of plays. They are human, just like you and I. Study the character of the output of the various studios by reading the release stories and studying the screen action. Because a story does not sell in one market is no convincing reason that some other editor is not lying in wait for just such a plot. Every studio has a policy and the editors and directors of every company have their likes and dislikes. Study and endeavor to conform with them.

A RARE GIFT

An author, he he picture playwright or fiction writer, is rarely a good judge of his own stuff. Occasionally you will find an author who can judge his work correctly, but it is a rare gift. Last month we turned out a 2,000 word feature story. We performed a labor of love with it and were confident it would readily market. After mailing that story we turned out a 300-word "filler" for another periodical. We wrote the "filler" in twenty minutes. We sold that "filler" hot from the griddle. "Good work; keep it up," wrote an editor to us. And that 2,000-word "feature" had to be revamped before it sold. The thought "My picturepleay is just as good," etc., comes in the same category. You may think your stuff just as good as that appearing upon the screen. But are you a proper judge of your own work?

HONESTY THE BEST POLICY

Mr. A. W. Thomas, associate editor Photoplay Magazine, gives some good advice to beginners:

> Let's be as honest in the writing, advising and criticising of photoplay scripts as it applies to the individual as we would were we to advise a farmer not to go into the jewelry business or tell a ditch digger he would not be a success as a trombone player. It is not an easy thing to write an acceptable picture plot; every one can not do it, regardless of alluring advertisements of various concerns to the contrary. One with any degree of dramatic talent can be further developed by the advice and aid of one experienced in the art of photoplay writing, but it takes study, concentration, thought, a vivid mind and imagination and most of all a tenacity "to stick till success comes." And to those who will "stick" comes remuneration in proportion to the time and talent contributed. Yet, there are no more uncertainties in photoplay writing than in any other work—legal, technical, business or politics. One should not make photoplay writing a gamble—go into it with a desire to "make good" and follow the advice of those who know rather than work on guess, chance and luck. Be as honest with yourself and the editor as it is possible to be in any other work—and honesty pays in all work.

SOMETHING DIFFERENT

"Something different" is an ancient warcry—but it holds good. Never in the history of picture playwriting was there a better opportunity for the writer with originality to sell his work, than now. All the old themes have been done to death and the original script is being seized upon by the editor like manna in the wilderness. Louis Reeves Harrison hints of the prevailing conditions in an excellent article on threadbare plots. We quote: "When all these themes have been worked threadbare and relegated to the theatrical lumber room with the mechanical devices of long ago, when what is obviously irrational and silly has gone to the film scrap heap; when feuds and shooting on sight that do not belong to normal life that most of us recognize appear as only frayed relics of the past; when directors are weary of trying to revive stale stories, we may get some plays with a punch, in which the characters evolve their own destinies instead of being saved." And those Plays-With-A-Punch are rare. The editors want them—and are willing to pay for them, they say. Can you furnish Plays-With-A-Punch?

SYNOPSIS OF STORY OF THE A. H. WOODS PRODUCTION OF "THE MIRACLE"

The following handed to us by the representative of the A. H. Woods Co. gives an insight into the story of the play as produced by them.

The opening scene shows the interior of a large cathedral on the Rhine, in the center of which stands the miraculous image of the Madonna, gifted with strange powers to heal the sick, curing the halt and the lame, and restoring the crippled. The Abbess turns over the keys of the cathedral to a young and beautiful nun, who has been selected by the entire convent to care for the image. Kneeling at the feet of the Madonna, she hears the singing of the happy children outside and the far-off piping of a Spielmann. Leaving her place and slowly walking to the huge doors of the cathedral, she becomes so strongly influenced by them that she dances and sings with them in their joy. Turning again toward the door, she stops, for there appears a handsome knight in glittering armor standing on the hill outside. She stands motionless returning the gaze of the knight until disturbed by the sisters. The Abbess, seeing the nun waver, sternly rebukes her for neglecting her duty and sentences her as a punishment to remain kneeling all night, alone, at the feet of the image of the Madonna. She summons all her courage to withstand the temptation of the world. Outside the cathedral a nightingale is singing and the moon shines brightly. There is a knocking on the great doors—it is the calling of the world outside. Unable to longer resist, the nun hurries back and falls upon her knees once more before the miraculous image and appeals for her freedom. Failing to restrain herself longer and led on by the Spielmann, she resolves to take the chance of freedom which is now offered her.

Mounting their steeds, she and her knight ride up the hill and out of sight into the great world beyond. The nun and her lover, accompanied by the Spielmann, enjoy life to the full; the joy of living has entered the woman's heart but is short-lived. The Robber Count kills her knight and carries her to his hunting lodge where, in turn, the son of the king arrives during the banquet and wins the woman from the Robber Count by a throw of dice, carrying her off amongst the encouragement of the half-drunken revellers. The Count kills himself and the Spielmann, as in the case of the knight, plays over his dead body the melody of death.

The Spielmann is hurrying her from one indignity to another. He has dragged her deeper into the mire with the bewitching tunes of his pipes. One lover after another has met his death as the penalty of falling a victim to her wonderful beauty.

Hearing of his son's infatuation, the King forces him to give up the woman and, later in a fight with armed assassins, he kills him. The people drag her before the judges of the inquisition as a witch. The judges in turn are overcome by her wonderful beauty and allow her to go free. She returns to the cathedral to pray for forgiveness before the Image. The light of day is seen coming in through the stained windows and the nun awakens from a deep sleep. In bewilderment she looks around her, vaguely wondering where she is. Slowly the thought comes over her that she has been sleeping. Reverently she rises, crosses herself and bows low before the miraculous Image. Walking slowly and thoughtfully toward the portals of the cathedral, she opens the doors to welcome the first rays of the morning sun and tolls the bell for matins. It was a dream!

MANUFACTURERS' NOTES

The Crystal Film Company has just finished the installation of two new drums in its drying room. Each of these drums is twelve feet in diameter and seven and a half feet long, and capable of holding 2,381 feet of film. The Crystal is preparing to install two more such drums and the same are now in course of construction, and when completed the Crystal's drying room capacity will be 9,524 feet. These drums make forty revolutions a minute, and without the aid of artificial heat film is dried in fifteen to twenty minutes, giving them a capacity of 100,000 feet with only ten changes per working day of eight hours. As it is readily possible to have at least twenty changes, they are in a position to dry in the neighborhood of 200,000 feet per day, should it be necessary.

The Crystal has now one of the best equipped factories in America, and with such working facilities, the technical excellence of Crystal films will be maintained and the great amount of work turned out by them can readily be appreciated.

With the "Flying A" release entitled "The Would-Be Heir," a new player will make her initial bow on the screens for the favor of the motion picture loving public.

Miss Charlotte Burton, who has been engaged by Director Dwan to play opposite Jack Richardson in heavy rôles with the Western "Flying A" company, while new in the realm of "movies," is an old favorite in Coast stock productions.

For three seasons she starred in Theodore Kremer's production, "Buried at Sea," in which play she was supported by Mr. Orrall Humphrey.

She was successful from the first and received many favorable criticisms from the press and public. One critic in reviewing her work writes: "Charlotte Burton, the leading lady, makes a very good impression. She is young and beautiful, with a superb figure, and reads her lines with cleverness. This girl will certainly succeed."

While Miss Burton will invariably be cast in parts depicting intrigue and villainy, the public will, no doubt, welcome her as eagerly as they do that "Prince of Villains," Jack Richardson.

Doing the sister act with the "Land o' Cotton" on the Gaumont great event Saturday release of November 9th was the "Life of Woodrow Wilson," who is now identified as the President-elect. This film showed the birthplace of Wilson in old Virginia, where he played hookey and marbles; where he attended college at the University when he had "growed up"; his home at Princeton and the college over which he so long presided; the convention at Baltimore which nominated him, and the scenes of his notification of nomination at Sea Girt, N. A cinematographic demonstration was given by Prof. Paul Heger, of Brussels, showing the effects of poisons on the heart and the circulation of blood in the blood vessels. The object of the demonstration was to prove the utility and importance of the cinematograph in the teaching of science to large classes of students, especially in displaying on a large scale things otherwise observable only under the microscope. Prof. Heger suggested to the section the establishment of a central cinematograph institute, where physiologists could prepare such films for use in teaching.—London Times.

EXHIBITORS' NOTES

Owing to lack of support on the part of citizens of Newark, N. J., and vicinity, the Symphony Auditorium, Broad and Hill Streets, will, on December 14, be turned from a theatre of high-class music and song into a vaudeville and moving picture house.

This announcement was made by Siegfried Leschziner, as head of the Chelsea Securities and Investment Company, which concern conceived and built the auditorium. A lease to extend for a number of years, should the new venture prove successful, has been given the Pacific Amusement Company, of New York, a theatrical corporation, controlling a circuit of ninety-eight amusement companies. Vaudeville and other forms of "polite" theatrical entertainment would be given, and moving pictures will possibly be included. It is expected that Mrs. Leslie Carter may be among the attractions on the opening night, December 14.

Says the Hammond, Ind., Times:

Offers varying from $9,000 to $11,000 are said to be annual lease bids for the new five-story Gary theatre which is now being constructed for the Northern Indiana Investment Corporation. The theatre will be larger than the Blackstone in Chicago, it will be thoroughly up-to-date, and will have a seating capacity of 1,400.

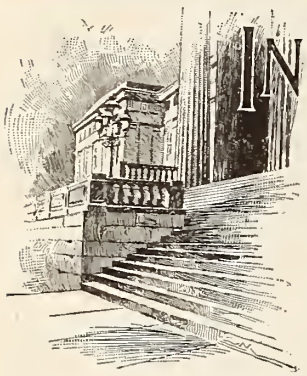
Storerooms and offices will be located in the new building which represents an investment of $100,000. Besides the theatre rental there will be an income from these leases.

It is said that Klaw & Erlanger and other big theatrical firms have been trying to get the lease on the Gary theatre, which will be completed a year from now. An Indianapolis firm is said to have offered $10,000 a year for the theatre.

Ingwald Moe, the Gary contractor; Henry G. Hay, president of the Gary State Bank, and a number of steel company officials furnished the money for the enterprise which will mean much to Gary. The theatre will be the finest north of Indianapolis, and the building housing it will be the most imposing block in Broadway. Second story height has been attained in its construction.

INNOVATIVE

Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Especially for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City



the Patent Office the efforts of the American Bar Association to obtain legislation looking to the establishment of a Court of Patent Appeals are fully appreciated and endorsed. The Commissioner is of the opinion that such a law should be passed at the earliest practicable moment. A patent is granted by the Government, which is effective throughout the United States and Territories. When this patent, however, is involved in a suit which is brought in any judicial district, the final decision, on appeal, is rendered by the Circuit Court of Appeals of that jurisdiction. A decision involving the construction of a patent by the Circuit Court of Appeals of one jurisdiction is effective only for that jurisdiction and has no legal effect in any other of the several circuits, except through comity. There have been in the past decisions rendered by several Circuit Courts of Appeals which are directly opposed to each other. In view of the fact that a patent when issued is effective in all the States and Territories, it is very clear that there should be one Court of Patent Appeals whose decisions will control the status of that patent throughout the entire country. The importance of this is evident when it is considered that there are nine Circuit Courts of Appeals and one Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, and each of which may, and often does, entertain in some particular a different view from the others with regard to the same patent.

The Optische Anstalt C. P. Goerz Aktiengesellschaft, Friedenau, near Berlin, Germany, has been granted certificate of Registration No. 88,938, for the trade-mark "TENAX," used since 1906, for photographic, kinematographic and kindred apparatus and supplies generally, including three-color apparatus.

Patent No. 1,040,303, issued to John W. Frakes, of Chicago, Ill., relates to theatrical apparatus of the "Vacuum Act" class, the object being to provide means adapted to be controlled by an unskilled operator, and which may be readily transported from place to place. The apparatus consists essentially of a series of inverted vacuum cups or cylinders each adapted by hidden means to be connected alternately with an exhaust chamber or with the atmosphere through the medium of electrically controlled valves actuated by an unseen operator, who, however, must have the performer in sight and anticipate the latter's requirements. The performer wears disc-shaped sandals, by which the lower ends of the vacuum cups may be closed successively, care being taken to secure support from each succeeding cylinder before release from the preceding one. If this is or may be effected by an "unskilled operator," as claimed in the specification, it would seem that the act may be considered an inverted tramp stunt without "visible means of support," in which the performer takes all the risk. What would happen if the operator were addle-brained as well as unskilled is not set forth, but it is safe to presume that the performer would tumble to the fact sooner or later.

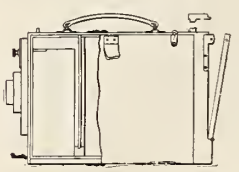
In Holt & Co. vs. Kansas Milling & Expert Co., O. G. 184, p. 286, the Assistant Commissioner holds that in judging of the similarity of words as trade-marks three features must be taken into consideration: First, the appearance of the words; second, the sound of the words when spoken, and, third, the significance or meaning of the words. Thus, in the case at issue, the registered word "Noblesse" was held to bar "Nobility" for the same class of goods. Not only does the French word "Noblesse" when translated into English mean "nobility" or "nobleness," but, as appears from the Century Dictionary, the two words belong to the English language and are synonyms. Furthermore, the words so nearly resemble each other as to be likely to cause confusion in the mind of the public.

The parrot as an accessory to the art is not exactly a novelty, having been frequently seen on the film in subordinate roles of negative character, but we note a positive innovation in this respect, as witness the following quotation from the Dramatic Mirror: "Recently while producing a Selig picture entitled 'Object Matrimony,' the producer had occasion to use a talkative parrot in some of the scenes. Myrtle Stedman, playing the part of an eccentric old maid, is supposed to fall violently in love with a young and handsome cowboy. The cowboy, in his efforts to escape from the old maid's clutches, places her and her parrot in his single-seated rig and starts to drive at a breakneck speed for his ranch. As the buggy rounded a sharp turn and came into full view of the camera, with Miss Stedman clinging madly to the neck of the cowboy, the producer and other members of the company watching the scene were suddenly convulsed with laughter. The parrot had inspired the mirth by shrieking at the top of his squeaky voice, the following advice: "Cut it out you damn fool—cut it out."

The verdict rendered by the United States Circuit Court of New Jersey against the Melies Company, in the matter of its suit against the Motion Picture Patents Company, has been sustained in an opinion handed down by Judge Gray, of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, sitting in Philadelphia. The verdict upheld the Motion Pictures Patent Company in its refusal to renew the license of the Melies Company because the latter had assigned a majority of its stock contrary to contract.



Patent No. 1,040,591, to Geo. C. Thomas, of Liscard, in the County of Chester, England, is designed primarily to provide simple and inexpensive apparatus for taking photographs, ordinary or kinematographic, and also for projecting them or slides onto a screen. The standard-sized kinematograph film may be used. The accompanying diagram represents a side elevation of the apparatus, with the side door partly broken away, the casing for the operative parts being in the form of a box hand camera, in combination with which are claimed film moving mechanism having sprocket wheels, gearing and spindles, and disposed intermediate the front and back walls of said casing; means for carrying sensitive media at the rear of the casing; casing walls having grooves therein for enabling the said mechanism to be removably fitted in the casing; means for imparting motion to the spindles; a wall with apertures therein enabling the means for imparting motion to the spindles to be connected with one of the spindles from the outside of the casing; means for closing the said apertures and making the casing light-tight; and a door for enabling the mechanism to be fitted in and removed from the casing.

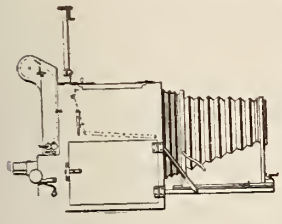
A "DEADLY WEAPON, to-wit, a bulldog," has been recognized as a legitimate definition in an affidavit charging felonious assault, and sufficient to hold the aggressor for the action of the Grand Jury; this following a recent decision of a Chicago judge that an automobile is a deadly weapon. In either case the chauffeur or chauffeuse is presumably responsible, and not the "weapon."



Patent No. 1,041,122, issued to Robert J. London and James A. London, of Glen Allen, Missouri, is for photographic apparatus having improved means for conveying the photo-sensitive material to the various tanks or receptacles used in developing and fixing the same. The invention also embodies means whereby a roll of photo-sensitive material can be moved so as to bring different portions thereof successively into focus, the exposed portions being shifted to positions where they can be cut off subsequent to exposure and conveyed to the different baths provided. The claims are for photographic apparatus, including a box, tanks within the box for containing materials employed in the development and fixing of photographic images, means for holding a photo-sensitive material, means for feeding said material into focus, a slide, a carrier movable therewith, means for shifting the carrier into position to receive the exposed photo-sensitive material, and successively into and out of certain of the tanks, means for releasing the contents of the carrier when above one of the tanks, and other specific details of construction enumerated in a 600-folio specification and illustrated in several sheets of drawings.

Norman John Norman, of London, England, has applied for the registration of BIOFIX as a trade mark for "Apparatus for the Reproduction of Moving or Still Pictures." Claims use since July, 1911.

The old-fashioned family album, like the light of other days, is evidently doomed to innocuous desuetude. The latest Parisian fad is the introduction of the projector into private homes as means of perpetuating the personalities and idiosyncrasies of members of the family circle, particularly the rising generation. Bobbie Burns would hardly have penned his famous couplet re seeing "oursel's as others see us" had he lived in these degenerate times, for the moto-picto is veritably the desired "giftie." The fad has already received aristocratic approbation in this country, the "hundred-million-dollar baby" McLean having been "filmed" at Bar Harbor with his friends of the "400," his dogs and other pets, for the edification of his fond parents.

As another illustration of the district's erethistic temperament we note that saloon-keepers in Washington are kicking at the "Movies," and the members of the Excise Board are inclined to believe that the cause of temperance has found an ally in the motion picture show. So mote it be.

We shall be pleased to answer pertinent questions propounded by readers of the Moving Picture News.

"KINEMACOLOR FASHION WEEKLY" ANNOUNCED

Kinemacolor has entered into and is triumphing in so many branches of the motion picture field that every week or so there are announcements of new activities, with the optimistic thought from the 1,600 Broadway offices that soon the process will have no rivals in the particular endeavor undertaken.

This time comes the heralding of "The Kinemacolor Weekly Fashions," which, because of the ability of the process to produce colors exactly as in nature, is sure to live up to the company's reputation for triumphs.

By arrangement with the leading creators of fashion in women's apparel the Kinemacolor people will have the color-films cut to the houses subscribing to their service in many cases before the model gown has left the modiste's. Besides gowns and dresses and trappings of fur and cloaks for the opera there will be included the latest hair-dressing styles, and all the startling innovations of attire which increase milady's beauty. In this work Kinemacolor is perfect; the sheen of satin and the lustre of fine silks or deep hued velvets is transferred in absolute realism to the screen—even the fire and gleam which lies hidden in the depths of precious gems will be seen just as they are in life in these "Fashion Weeklies."

Nothing that a woman desires to know about fashion in dress but will be put into the new color-films, which are being produced without regard to expense. The various topics will be treated in a systematic way, so that everything of interest to the public will have its due place in the weekly programmes.

MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS OF NEW YORK SECOND ANNUAL BALL

One of the Greatest Successes in the Moving Picture Industry Ever Known

BY THE EDITOR

"Everybody, who was anybody," in the motion picture industry in New York City, allied with the art, directly or indirectly, was present at the monster ball given by the Exhibitors' League of New York City at Palm Garden, Thursday, Nov. 14th. It is impossible at this short time to enumerate all who were present, but special mention must be made of Chief Justices Russell and Duell representing the bench. The City authorities were represented by Corporation Counsel Chief Wallace, of the Board of Water, Gas and Electricity; the aldermen by Alderman Folk. The manufacturers were represented by actors and actresses galore, and special mention must be made of the Vitagraph Studios, who furnished matter for the vaudeville sketches, finishing up with the inimitable Bunny, the star comedian of the industry.

We noticed among the manufacturers Carl Laemmle, president of the Universal; Pat Powers, vice-president, and his henchman, Tom Evans. The Film Supply was represented by President Aitken, Harry Raver and Joe Miles, Herbert and Madame Blache. The Feature Film Companies by H. A. Spanuth, A. J. Danziger, Herbert Miles and, of course, Mrs. Miles, and Attorney Kepler. Among the machine people we noticed Eric Morrison, of the Standard; Mr. Clark, of the Motiograph; Mr. Coles, of Powers, and Frank Cannoch, of the Simplex. Special mention must be made of the presence of the president of the National League, M. A. Neff, who made quite an interesting address, which was preceded by the presentation of a loving cup to Sam Trigger, the indefatigable president of the New York Exhibitors' Association.

Newspaper men were there galore. The World was represented by Joseph Hoff and H. Von Harleman; the Clipper by Arthur Ray; the Morning Telegraph by Johnstone and Farnam, and the Moving Picture News by all of its staff. To all whom we talked the verdict was success and full enjoyment. Fuller report will appear in our next issue.

AS OUR "ROVING COMMISSIONER" SAW IT

It was indeed a gala event. We doubt if ever before Palm Garden, which has long done service to New York's festivities, has groaned beneath such a weight of gaiety.

A delightful burden of loveliness it was that ran rampant over three floors—bright eyes, shimmering gowns, gleaming white shirt fronts and jewels galore. A happy throng withal, in spite of the pushing and jostling, the trampling on toes, etc. No one was ill-humored, and the roughest handling in a crowd so tightly packed together was taken by one and all with a laugh of good humor.

There must have been at the very least two thousand couples present on that night of November 14th, at this splendid affair, given by the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of New York City. The principal decorations were in gold and white. The boxes in the gallery above the main ballroom, which were occupied principally by manufacturers and the press, were taxed to their limit with their rightful occupants and visitors.

At eight o'clock the entertainment of moving pictures, music and vaudeville commenced, in which participated many of the moving picture favorites, who were hailed with storms of applause. Miss Flora Finch and Miss Florence Turner were the only ones of the female representation of the picture players who ventured forth with the exception of the "Thanhouser Kid," Miss Marie Thanhouser. John Bunny, Maurice Costello, King Baggot and a number of other popular picture actors spoke a word to the audience, and in almost every instance "spoke their piece." The General Film Publicity and Sales Company exhibited some splendid Japanese films, including the funeral of the Mikado. One reel of "The Miracle," from the New York Film Company, was shown, and for lack of time the remainder of this wonderful photo play was omitted, much to the dissatisfaction of the audience. The Arrow Film Company exhibited a good comedy entitled "His Wedding Day." Imp showed up most favorably with "Officer 174," and from Thanhouser "The Truant's Doom," with the "Thanhouser Kid" starring, elicited roars of laughter that must have been a satisfaction to the clever little girl who witnessed it sitting in the box beside Miss Flo Labadie.

One of the pleasant things of the evening was the address of M. A. Neff, president of the National Exhibitors' League. It was a pleasure indeed to see this honored member present on this auspicious occasion.

The president of the local branch, Samuel Trigger, was presented by his appreciative fellow-workers with a beautiful silver loving cup. Mr. Trigger was actually almost taken off his feet by this unexpected token of appreciation and respect, and no one could have been more surprised than was he at the honor thrust upon him.

The entertainment committee and officers of the Association looked well to the entertainment of their guests. Mr. Sydney Ascher, secretary, was here, there, and everywhere as were also Mr. Rosenthal, Mr. Samuels and other prominent members of the Association.

KEYSTONE FILM CO.

The Keystone Film Company, in keeping with its well-known policy of being ever ready to help the exhibitor and boost his business, has gone them all one better this time.

They have prepared photographs of the four leading players in the Keystone Comedy Company, Miss Mabel Normand, Mr. Mack Sennett, Mr. Fred Mace and Mr. Ford Sterling, and will distribute a set of these lobby beautifiers and publicity aids free to every exhibitor receiving his film service from exchanges handling the Keystone output. The photographs are 11 x 14 inches in size, beautifully finished, and are suitable for framing.

This offer is unprecedented in the trade, and will do much to increase the feeling of enthusiasm and confidence which exhibitors have in Keystone products and methods.

SYDNEY ASCHER DISPOSES OF THEATRE INTERESTS TEMPORARILY

It is reported that Sydney Ascher, the well-known motion picture exhibitor, secretary of the local branch of New York Motion Picture League, and also vice-president of the National League, has disposed of his interests in the Nicoland on Third avenue, and also Saratoga Park, Brooklyn. Mr. Ascher is also contemplating an extended trip to Bermuda.

NEW YORK FILM CO.

Mr. A. J. Danziger, of the New York Film Company, in a letter to the Editor concerning the American rights of "The Miracle," made the following statement:

The exclusive title of the New York Film Company to the American rights of "The Miracle" have never been, nor can they be, challenged in court. The New York Film Company is in possession of the only sets of films of "The Miracle" now in the United States, and is also holding a certificate of copyright registration, class L, XXc No. 103. If there is another film production of "The Miracle" in this country or abroad it has never been shown anywhere, either in private or in public. The story of "The Miracle" was first printed in the early works of the Bollandists Vitæ Sanctorum "Lives of the Saints," in the early part of the seventeenth century. It was reprinted by St. Alphonsus de Liguori in his "Glories of Mary," and has since been used in modern literature by Gottfried Keller in his "Seven Legends," by Maurice Maeterlinck in his "Sister Beatrice" and by many others too numerous to mention. The last one to use the story was a scenario writer employed by the famous originator of wordless plays, Mr. Max Reinhardt. While all the writers, both religious and secular, have treated the sweet and pathetic legend of the fall and redemption of Sister Beatrice with great reverence, Mr. Reinhardt's scenario writer has made an ultra-sensational story of it in which Sister Beatrice loses our sympathy and is needlessly degraded. In this version she returns to the convent in a melodramatic snowstorm with a child in her arms, while her lovers, no less than fifteen in number, appear and spurn her in a somewhat brutal manner. Our version of "The Miracle" does not wound the religious sensibilities of any part of the Christian Church. The sublime symbolism and the consoling lesson of the story shine out with marvelous distinctness. The climax is just like the old original legend and makes a most happy ending, the return of Sister Beatrice to her faith and her duties.

A certain group of theatrical managers, who have since purchased the rights for the United States of Mr. Reinhardt, who is presently producing a picture of his original play, claim that our production infringes upon the scenario which they hold copyright for. It is not our desire to antagonize our opponents, but in justice to them and to ourselves we wish to state that their attack upon us is entirely unwarranted inasmuch as we have exhibited the film in the Fourteenth Street Theatre some time ago to them and to their attorneys, as well as to experts of the Customs Department, and their protest was then dismissed by all authorities.

I shall highly appreciate to have these facts made known to your readers. Yours truly,

A. J. DANZIGER.

OLGA, THE ADVENTURESS (Nov. 21).—Baron De Tournay, a musician and composer, betroths his daughter Delicia to the Chevalier De Maison. He then attends a party at which the celebrated singer, Olga Pavlova is to sign. The old man becomes infatuated with her and invites her to spend a few days at his country home. His daughter intuitively feels that the Countess is an adventuress and her misgivings are justified when the entrapped father asks the Countess to marry him. Delicia, in sorrow that her dead mother's place should be filled by such a creature, has her fiance instigate inquiry into the past of the diva. He obtains a report from the police which tells of the scandalous and criminal actions of the singer in Vienna, Moscow and Budapest and that she had several times been in prison for felonies. Using this letter as a club he tries to frighten the adventuress into abandoning her scheme of marrying the Baron and incidentally his money. The adventuress, by a ruse, gives the Baron the idea that the young man is infatuated with her and that he has tried to induce her to elope with him. She has told the young man that she will submit to his demands under penalty of disclosure. She meets the Chevalier at the rendezvous ostensibly confirming the story she told of his perfidy to the Baron. She gallops away with the Chevalier and later they enter a boat to row to the far side of the river from whence she was to leave the neighborhood forever. As they get out upon the stream, the Chevalier, after many pleadings, unwisely gives her the incriminating paper. With the document now in her hands, the Countess suddenly pushes the Chevalier overboard and as he tries to clamber into the boat strikes him upon the head with an oar. She then goes back to the shore, where the Baron awaits her, believing the Chevalier to have been drowned. She explains her actions to the Baron by saying that she was compelled to so act to defend her honor. The Chevalier, however, not to be so easily killed, reaches the shore, mounts his horse, still grazing on the bank, and pursues the attempted murderess and her dupe. He drags the woman from her horse and as she lays partly stunned, he then has to combat the frenzied Baron. He persuades the latter, however, to allow him to draw from the bodice of the woman, where she had concealed it, the police report, which he shows to the astounded nobleman, who then, realizing that he had escaped a great peril, orders the adventuress from his sight.

A BURGLAR BALKED (Nov. 26).—Jimmie, in a restless mood, wants to accompany his mother on a journey, but the stern parent deems it best for him to serve a term in school on a diet of readin', writin' and 'rithmetic. Jimmie waxes orful naughty and insists on going along to chaperon mother. Accordingly he jumps into her trunk, which she has obligingly left open for him. The trunk is locked and sealed and goes on its baggage way. At the end of the day the trunk is trundled to a hotel and by an error is put into the room of a hotel thief, which is on the same floor with the room of his mother. When the trunk is opened Jimmie looks over the situation and decides that he will foil the villain. He becomes quite opinionated on the subject. When the thief goes on an expedition into Jimmie's mother's room and returns with the family jewels, in which Jimmie knows his mother has a strong interest. The thief lays his revolver where Jimmy can jump quickly out and grasp it and the burglar turns about to find the diminutive apprehender pointing the six-shooter at the thief's liver. Jimmie, still covering the thief with the revolver, summons aid and attendants rush in and heroically grapple with the burglar. Jimmie's mother, attracted by the noise, enters the room and finding her son is about to administer corporal punishment, when she finds her jewels where the burglar had left them on the chair. Accordingly she metaphorically kills the fatted calf in Jimmie's honor and falls (not jumps) on her young hopeful's neck.

RELIANCE

THE BROTHER OF THE "BAT" (Nov. 30).—Marbray Lewis is a young millionaire clubman who has led a very selfish life. He falls in love with Alice Graham, but she refuses to marry him until he has done something for somebody else beside himself. She suggests he join the "Big Brother" movement and become brother to the "Bat," a small boy who that day was arrested for trying to steal her purse. Marbray agrees and the "Bat" is paroled in his care. The boy has no use for his new guardian and thinks he is a dude until he sees him box. Becoming interested he suggests a new training. The Bat, very much in earnest, is permitted to act as Marbray's trainer. Under his instructions the young luxury-loving millionaire is not permitted to eat anything he likes, he is deprived of cigarettes and made to take cold baths and run for miles. He gets no sympathy from Alice, who approves of the training. Just when the "Bat" is becoming fond of his new brother, his real brother, a Bowery prize fighter, known as the "Slugger," finds him and drags him back to the old life. The "Slugger" and his pals decide to have the "Bat" admit them to Marbray's home so that they may rob it. Once inside the boy warns Marbray, who is giving a dinner party. The "Bat" pleads for his brother and the young millionaire tells him to go, but the "Slugger" announces he will take the "Bat" with him. Marbray suggests that they fight for the boy. The "Slugger" laughs at the idea, but agrees. Starting out confident of his ability to knock out the "dude," he soon finds he has a foeman worthy of his steel. Despite his best efforts Marbray gets the best of him and, true to his promise, the "Slugger" leaves the boy with Marbray. When Alice rushes in with the other guests, alarmed at the noise, she finds him there with a black eye, and learns the whole story. Satisfied that Marbray is at last the man she would have him, she accepts his heart and hand.

AMERICAN

THE THIEF'S WIFE (Nov. 18).—The call of nature amid primal surroundings has always been a theme for romancers to dwell upon as one of happiness, but sordidness can detract from even all of nature's beauties.

Left alone, except for the occasions when her husband returns to maltreat and abuse her, Effie Neville's cup of bitterness was not full until one day he dashed into their rude hut and, hastily concealing something within the house, said to her with a curse, "If anyone asks for me, tell them I ain't got back yet." He hurries away and is soon lost to view in the underbrush. After he has gone she enters the shack and finds what her husband has secreted—a bag of gold. The realization dawns upon her that her husband is a thief as well as a brute, and the discovery is a bitter one. Soon the sheriff's posse arrives, but the loyal wife, obeying the injunction of her husband, tells them he has not yet returned. However, the sharp eyes of the sheriff have noted the track of a man, both coming and going from the house, and, leading his posse away, the man-hunt is on. Following the track they soon come into the vicinity of the outlaw, who, by a circuitous route, regains his house and locks himself within. The posse discover the ruse and attack the house until the sheriff orders them to cease firing from fear of injuring the woman. Leaving their horses they attempt to rush the house, when the outlaw, firing from an upper window, severely wounds the sheriff. Sliding down from the loft as the posse enter the door, the outlaw secures the sheriff's horse and hurries away. The posse follow him, while the outlaw's wife busies herself in binding up the sheriff's wounds. Something about the gentleness of her touches the heart of the rugged man and he determines to extend to her every protection. The poor wife secures the bag of gold and, giving it to the sheriff, she asks now, that the money is returned, they pursue her husband no longer. In the meantime the posse has overtaken the outlaw and on his refusal to surrender, they fire and he is dangerously wounded. They hurry him back to the hut where the sight of the sheriff and his wife infuriates him. Straining at his captors to release himself, he completes the work the bullet began and falls dying at their feet. The posse file away while the sheriff extends the hand of sympathy and succor to the bereaved woman.

THE WOULD-BE HEIR (Nov. 21).—Alone in the world with the exception of her worthless cousin, who lived from her bounty and hoped some day to inherit her possessions, Ethel Rivers had learned to love her foreman, Jack Mason, and she was very happy. Her cousin determines to estrange the couple as Ethel's marriage would conflict with his plan to secure possession of her ranch. He confers with his servant and together they evolve a plot. He is to simulate an injury and the servant is to go to Ethel for succor. Then the servant is to entice the foreman to a convenient spot to witness his sweetheart's perfidy, the cousin endeavoring to make the scene as lover-like as possible, thus arousing Jack's anger. When the servant arrives at the ranch with the washing she simulates great excitement and tells Ethel that her cousin has broken his leg. Ethel hurries to her cousin to help him and the servant seeks the foreman and tells him that his sweetheart is false. He becomes very angry, but when she offers proof he agrees to go with her. The scene she brings him to witness sends a pang of jealousy through him and, returning to his room, he secures his belongings and prepares to leave the ranch. He bids good-bye to the boys but ignores his sweetheart, who, at a loss to understand his changed attitude toward her, gives way to uncontrolled weeping. As he passes the hut of the servant he is startled by hearing his name mentioned and that of his sweetheart. The plotters are talking over the success of their plans, unconscious of the fact that they are being overheard. Jack rushes at them and assaulting the worthless cousin, refrains from striking the servant only because of her sex. He then returns to his sweetheart and, after explanations, joy again reigns supreme in the hearts of the lovers.

Billy is so very small that Tom conceives the idea of dressing him in baby's clothes and leaving him on the doorstep of a handsome residence, so that he will be taken into the bosom of a wealthy family, where he will be in a position to at least get enough to eat to relieve their immediate healthy appetites.

Billy is left upon Mrs. Love's doorstep, where he is found and received with joy by the family. He has a hard time keeping from making love to the maid, and at night admits Tom to the house and entertains him in lavish style with the aid of Mr. Love's cigars and champagne.

The maid takes Billy out for an airing in the baby carriage. THE UNEXPECTED HONEYMOON (Nov. 18).—Newly married Thomas and Mary MacGregor attend the village fair on their honeymoon. Thomas in his kilties with his bagpipes slung across his shoulder proudly escorts his blushing bride about the grounds from booth to booth.

The balloon ascension is advertised for the afternoon. Everything is in readiness and Mary, with a woman's curiosity, induces Thomas to enter the basket of the balloon. She enjoys the novelty and thinks she will have something to tell her neighbors. She does, and more, too; for some mischievous boys cut the ropes holding the balloon and it rises, taking the pair on a honeymoon trip, entirely unexpected. They travel fast and long until the balloon collapses upon a desert island, among a tribe of cannibals, who think the couple are gods descended from the skies. Thomas recognizes this and acts the part. He plays his bag-pipes and they all dance right merrily.

He deposes the king and runs things with a high hand. The natives, however, as they become better acquainted with Thomas and Mary, realize that they are only human beings like themselves. They decide to put an end to their reign and begin preparations for their execution and cooking. The night before the day they are to be put to death, Thomas and Mary escape to the seashore, where they hail a passing vessel which lands a boat loaded with men, who rescue the terrified couple, for they are almost within the grasp of the hungry cannibals, in hot pursuit.

ROMANCE OF A RICKSHAW (Nov. 19).—Life at a military post in India never grows monotonous. This series of animated incidents convinces us of that. Mabel, the beautiful daughter of General Lewis, has considerable variety of her love affairs when she finds herself loved by Lieutenant Graham, of her father's staff, and very much sought after by a rich Indian Rajah, whom she meets at a garden party.

Hoping to displace the lieutenant in Mabel's favor, he proposes and is promptly refused. He vows to possess her at all costs, waits his opportunity, and abducts her, while a military ball to which he has been invited is in progress. Dennis, Graham's servant, who has a leave of absence, and is wandering aimlessly about, viewing the moon through the end of a black bottle, meets the abductors and picks up Mabel's locket which she drops. He hastens to the lieutenant and tells him what he saw and shows him the trinket which he picked up.

Graham, with Dennis and another soldier, determine to rescue Mabel from the hands of the Rajah. They go to his palace, find the rickshaw in which she was abducted and some Hindoo raiment. They all disguise themselves, Dennis making up as a Hindoo Medicine Doctor. They gain entrance to the Rajah's presence. Dennis, with incantations and salutations, demands the presence of the foreign maiden. When Mabel appears, Lieutenant Graham draws a brace of revolvers from the folds of his robe, and, taking the Rajah and his attendants unawares, they hurry from the room, place Mabel in the rickshaw and are far on their way to the military post before the astonished Rajah can follow in pursuit. Safely reaching General Lewis's headquarters, Mabel is placed in her father's arms. The general acknowledges Graham's courage and gladly consents to his and Mabel's marriage.

HIGH EXPLOSIVES AS USED IN THE U. S. ARMY (Nov. 20).—Everyone realizes that the power behind the different armies and navies of the world lies in their offensive or defensive use of high explosives. Immediately we think of projectiles varying from the small but deadly rifle to the powerful thirteen-inch gun. We are, however, apt to place the other and even more important use of explosives in the hackground.

This picture is a hightly instructive film showing the use of a high explosive other than the force behind the deadly projectile. In this picture we have had the very ahle assistance of an expert on explosives attached to the Engineer Corps of the United States Army who was detailed to test the power and safety of a new and secret explosive which, if successful, is to be adopted by the United States.

The picture opens with a demolition squadron in heavy marching order, equipped in full field service, which includes "limhre" or dynamite wagon, shelter tents, poles, ponchos, blankets and rifles. Camp is pitched and the squadron is seen next laying three land mines. Every operation from the planting of explosives to electrical connection and the final terrific upheaval of the tons of earth and rocks is shown. Next stumps and trees are blown up and cut down hy the use of the explosive, showing the torn and shattered remains.

A feature of this picture is the construction, planting and explosion of a submarine mine. There are numerous other interesting and instructive points, such as the testing of the explosives hy smashing with a bullet at close range and burning a stick held in a man's hand.

Few opportunities present themselves for taking a picture of this sort and we consider it one which will be of universal interest to every audience.

He soon finds himself in a gamhling den where the bunco man induces him to take a drink. While in a drowsy state of mind they relieve him of what they suppose to he a package of money, after which he is roughly thrown out into the street. When Silas realizes he has lost his all he returns home, hearthroken and penitent.

His misfortune has changed his attitude towards his wife and he hecomes meek and subdued as she reprimands him for his disregard of her warning. Silas has the surprise of his life when he learns that, after all, he has not lost the money because his sagacious wife, at an opportune moment, extracted the package of money from his handhag and suhstituted a similar package containing a block of wood. The situation now becomes very droll as Sally Ann turns the table hy commanding Silas to do the housework while she goes to the big city to bank the money. WAS MABEL CURED (Nov. 22).—Mabel Jones returns home from boarding-school filled with the idea that she is a born novelist, and, with a partially written manuscript upon a sociological subject, in which the hero is a burglar.

Now, Mabel's father is a sergeant of police and, having had in his past experience about all the dealings with burglars he cares for, he turns a deaf ear to her tearful pleadings to be introduced to a member of this noble profession.

He commands her to turn her thoughts toward domestic science or poetry, and write about either the best method of darning socks or tuneful Spring.

Alas, however, Mabel persists in her determination and the sergeant is about to grow real angry when he sees a chance to cure her and her mad infatuation for underworld subjects. Among the sergeant's acquaintances is a rising young novelist named Jefferson Lang, who is also writing a sociological novel and in which the heroine is a sneak thief and who is bothering the boys about the station house to introduce him into circles where he, too, can obtain the necessary "atmosphere."

By clever planning and aided by the rest of the boys, Mabel and Jeff are brought together, he believing her to be "Shifty" Sadie, the sneak thief, and she knowing him as "Baffles" the gentleman burglar.

Then follows a game of cross purposes and misunderstandings between the young couple which culminates in them both being arrested by a strange policeman and locked up on charges of burglary, grand larceny and highway robbery combined. Unfortunately for the sergeant, his "fine station hand" in the matter is discovered by the unlucky pair at the eleventh hour and through the kindly aid of a prison chaplain they turn the tables on the sergeant and the station house in general by getting married and combining their efforts upon a novel which will undoubtedly set the world on fire.

THE OPEN ROAD (Nov. 18).—This is a very pretty story of rural life taken among the hills with the sheep, the oxen, the pumpkins and the corn playing their part in the telling.

Peggy Dodge and Seth Martin, the children of prosperous farmers, are in love with each other and both are content with their lot until the breath of the city is wafted upon Billy Martin, in the form of his old friend, Fred Dunn, who visits him, in company with his stylish sister. The sister Jean takes a fancy to Billy and asks him to come to the city, which he does, leaving his pretty little sweetheart of the farm alone. Daily she goes about her tasks, but misses her sweetheart more and more. He used to help her drive the oxen, herd the sheep, shuck the corn and all the daily little duties which made her life so happy. Every morning he was accustomed to meet her at the big gate, which he opened for her as she drove her oxen to the fields. Every evening he would meet her and together they would drive home and share the evening meal. But now she opens the gate by herself wistfully and sadly. She thinks of him every hour of the day, while he leads his busy life in the city. Billy soon tires of this, however, and one day decides to give up the bustle of the city and return to his farm and his sweetheart. This he does, creeping up to his bedroom one night and exchanging his beautifully cut tailor-made clothes for the home-spun of the farm. This done he creeps down to the same gate at which he was wont to meet Peggy, and as she starts to open the gate all alone, he leaps from his hiding place, faces her, and asks her forgiveness. The love he bore her was stronger than ever, and in a moment they were in each other's arms, and together drove the oxen home.

THE PARALYTIC (Nov. 27).—"You are a murderer, you are a murderer," kept ringing in Swenson's ears. The spirit of the agonized face of the paralytic drove Swenson to distraction. The spirit finally leads him to the brink of a river and there Swenson's career of crime ends.

The story revolves about the jealous plots of Stephen Swenson, a man with little or no moral sense. He is jealous of young Henry George, who is betrothed to Blanche, the daughter of the paralytic. Swenson hires two thugs to "do up" his rival. The thugs drop George down a well in the sight of the paralyzed man, who is powerless to interfere.

Knowing that the paralytic cannot divulge the crime, Swenson comes back to make love to the paralytic's daughter. What follows is the pantomimic agony of the paralyzed man in his mute attempts to disclose the fact that Swenson is a murderer.

JENKINS—PERKINS WAR (Nov. 29).—Sallie Jenkins and Billie Perkins are engaged to be married. Their fathers are very much pleased over the match. They discover them making love and then the fathers go to a political meeting. Old man Perkins is a rank Roosevelt man, and old man Jenkins is a Wilsonite. They have a fierce quarrel at the meeting. On their return they find their children still making love, and separate them.

Billie sends a note to his sweetheart, using a kite as a messenger, tying the note to the tail of the kite. Sallie, who is sitting by her window, receives the note which asks her to meet him in his auto, in an hour, and they would go to town and get married. Each, both the boy and the girl, leave a note to their respective fathers, telling them what they intended to do. Billy and Sallie drive away.

The respective parents discover the notes of their children, jump into a buggy, and drive after them. There is an explosion in the automobile, which gives the parents an opportunity to catch up with them. Billy's father takes him home in the buggy, with a grip which Sallie has handed Billy. Sallie's father takes her home, carrying the other grip. Sallie and Billy are locked in their rooms by their respective fathers. Billy decides to go to bed, and opens his grip to get out his night clothes and discovers that he has taken the wrong grip, and has all her nightclothes instead. Sallie also decides to go to bed and discovers that she has the wrong grip, and Billy's nightclothes instead of her own. Each one makes a package of the nightclothes and puts in under their pillow, with loving taps on the pillow.

At early dawn, Billy, disconsolate, decides to commit suicide and throw himself into the river. He leaves a note to his father, to this effect and, tearing up the sheets of the bed, makes a rope of the sheets of the bed and exits by the window. Sallie, also very disconsolate, decides to commit suicide at the same place and leaves a note to her father, telling him of her intention, and also makes a rope of the sheets of the bed and descends from the window.

Billie arrives at the boathouse. On the dock are a number of boats piled one on top of another, so that one cannot see from one side to the other. Billy arrives on one side, looks at the water—gets cold feet and sits down to think, drawing his hat down. As he does so, Sallie arrives on the other side of the boat, throws her gloves and pocketbook on the pier, looks at the water—gets cold feet and decides to wait.

These moments are fatal, for it gives the old people a chance to catch up and spoils the dual suicide—but Jenkins and Perkins wake up and the merry war is called off.

But while the poor mother has her husband to comfort her, the rich woman has no one. Mary and Dolly, with the baby, arrive at Mary's home and find no one in. They start to prepare the dinner; and when Mary's distracted parents return they find their children safe and sound, with a strange little girl, who says she has no one to care for her. Mary's mother good noturedly permits her to remain for dinner. A policeman enters, he tells them he has no report of their children, and sees Dolly. Recognizing her from the description he received of the missing rich child, he attempts to take her to the station. But she refuses to go and Mary's father slips out to tell Dolly's parents that their child is at the house. They return with him and, when Dolly sees them, she struggles so hard against going home that she pulls the table cloth and all the dinner off the table, much to Mary's consternation. Then Dolly suggests they all come over to her house, where there is plenty of dinner. After a little hesitation, Mary's parents consent. At the dinner table in the rich home, Mary's mother rises to ask her usual Thanksgiving blessing. And Dolly's mother and father, their hearts softened by their recent fright, are influenced by the spirit of Thanksgiving and become reconciled. After the big dinner Dolly with the baby in her arms, and Mary still holding the big doll, fall asleep on the couch, perfectly satisfied with the results of the trade.

ECLAIR

THE DARLING OF THE MOUNTER (Nov. 28).—Through the arrest of her father and only guardian, a little girl is left upon the hands of a party of Royal Mounted Police, of the Northwest woods. The men draw lots for the possession of the child. She is awarded to Jimsey, a young Englishman, who proceeds, with the assistance of a Chinese servant, to rear her as his own.

Some time fater little Clara is rescued from a dangerous situation by Morgan, her own father, who having escaped the bands of the mounted, is living as an outlaw in the woods. The child, not remembering him, cries for her papa Jimsey. When the father cannot endure her cries of hunger and grief any longer, he voluntarily puts his head into the noose by taking her back to the fort.

There he finds Jimsey alone. The latter's gratitude at having his little darling restored to him is so great that he is willing to connive at Morgan's second escape. The outlaw is apprehended in his attempt by the returning mounted police. Jimsey puts the proposition to them. If they send Morgan to the gallows they can never look their darling in the face again. Shall it be the law of God or man?

Morgan is supplied with arms and ammunition and sent to shift for himself down the river.

AT THE FLAME, THE BUTTERFLY BURNT ITS WINGS (Dec. 1).—The dark wing of death is already brushing the pale face of Leila and her family grieves. But a young doctor, a stranger, comes and soon the pretty flower comes back to life. Upon her rosy lips, her adorable smile plays once more and again she is the joy of the house. The young stranger charms her by sending her rich gifts.

Little by little love grows between the two young people and many pleasant hours pass. Now, Leila, coquettish and joyful, allows herself to be courted by a young man of her own country. A companion of the stranger passes and sees them together. He thinks his friend is being deceived and tells him what he has seen,

But poor Leila has really given her heart to the young stranger, who refuses to listen to the explanation, and leaves, and will never return. The smile has passed forever from the lips of the poor little woman. She would have preferred death to the departure of the stranger, who took with him her heart.

THANHOUSER

THE TRUANT'S DOOM (Nov .24).—Tommy was vigorously opposed to the idea of going to school. It was just the right season of the year to play (any season is that for the average healthy boy), but his arguments failed to impress his mother, and Tommy was led to the temple of education, figuratively an unwilling captive.

More experience in the classroom intensified his unfavorable impression. He stood it for a few days, then determined to rebel and, instead of going to school with the other boys, he played "hookey," and hied himself to where he knew there was good fishing.

He was happy for awhile, then weariness asserted itself, and he fell asleep. Perhaps the voice of conscience had a chance to be heard, anyway, Tommy had a most frightful dream. He imagined that cruel constables were placed upon his trail by a stern teacher, that he was captured in spite of his frantic efforts to escape, and led to court, where all reviled him. Even his own mother disowned him, as he was led away to a felon's cell and garbed in the striped uniform of shame.

In his dream he and another convict, a big, coarse, brutal man, escaped in the most daring fashion, but the bloodhounds of the law relentlessly took up the chase, overtook their prey at the banks of a river, and the trembling schoolboy was shot to death. He was extremely happy to wake up a few moments later and find he was still alive. In his gratitude he decided never to play truant again, asd, rushing to school, demanded sums, hard sums to do, and he did them.

THE THUNDERBOLT (Nov. 26.)—A broker, who was trying to get rich quickly and dishonestly, found himself in imminent danger of arrest. Just as he was preparing for flight a neighbor entered. This man had been poor all his life, but coming unexpectedly into a legacy of $10,000, decided that the broker was the man who could invest the money for him. The broker took that cash, stuffed it into his pockets and left his office forever. He decided that this windfall should be set apart for his little daughter. The old lodgekeeper on his estate had been in his employ for years, and was very fond of the little girl. To him the broker went, swore him to secrecy and obedience, and gave him the money, which he promised to hide from everybody until the girl came of age. The broker then departed, but was captured while trying to escape, convicted and served ten years in prison.

On his release the broker, now a weak, broken down old man, hunted up his old servant, intending to reclaim the money and with it and his daughter to start life anew in some foreign country. The servant had been faithful to his trust, but when the broker arrived the other man was on his death bed, and passed away without being able to tell where he had hidden the money.

The disappointment completely upset the ex-convict, and in his rage and despair he forgot everything, even his daughter, who tended him lovingly. She made a home for the old man in the lodge, and did her best to nurse him back to health and strength.

The two were sitting alone one night when a fearful storm arose. A thunderbolt struck the house, wrecked the stone chimney, and in fragments it fell tumbling into the room. The old man jumped forward, and out of the rubbish pulled a small strong box. He opened it with trembling hands and extracted a roll of bills. A yellow piece of paper was bound with them, but this dropped to the floor as the ex-convict excitedly counted the money.

The girl picked up the paper and glaced at it. She then learned that the bills were the same ones her father had stolen years before, the victim being the father of the young man to whom she was engaged.

The girl declared that the money should be restored to the rightful owner. The old man protested, and the argument grew heated. Suddenly the door opened and the girl's fiance entered. From his home nearby he had seen the lightning strike the lodge and hurried over to be of assistance. The girl took the money from her father, placed it in her sweetheart's hand and asked his forgiveness. "I don't want the money without you," he gently said, as he took her in his arms, and the past was forgotten in the happiness of their enduring love.

THE FOREST ROSE (Nov. 29).—On the breaking out of the war of the Revolution, two wealthy Virginia planter friends and neighbors, volunteered their services to defend their country. Forester was made colonel of his regiment while his chum, Maywood, became a captain. As the Government was embarrassed for funds, the two men mortgaged their plantations and turned their proceeds over for the benefit of the regiment. Colonel Forester fell, mortally wounded, at the battle of the Cowpens, but before he died, Captain Maywood promised that he would care for Forester's motherless little girl.

When the war concluded Captain Maywood found himself so financially involved that he was practically penniless. The condition of his affairs was represented to the general government and Congress made him a grant of one thousand acres of land in what is now Belmont county, Ohio, but was then known as the Northwestern Territory. Into this new country the family journeyed.

Maywood has two sons, and as the years went by, Albert, the older one, fell madly in love with Rose Forester, who had been brought up as one of the family. Albert constantly urged his father to take precautions against the danger of an Indian outbreak, but the elder man was optimistic and declared there was no danger. Father and son were not particularly on good terms for the boy refused to participate in the farm work, preferring to go hunting and scouting with his friend, Louis Wetzel, one of the most noted of the early pioneers.

Returning from an expedition one day the two men were horrified on finding that the Maywood cabin had been destroyed by Indians, and all its occupants apparently slain. Wetzel, however, by virtue of his woodcraft, ascertained that Rose had been carried off by the Indians, and with Albert he started out to rescue her. Before their departure the young man kneeling at the graves of his parents and his brother, took a solemn vow to avenge them, and swore that he would never rest until he had rescued the woman he loved, "His Forest Rose."

Part II.

Albert Maywood, whose parents had been slain, and his sweetheart, Rose Forest, "The Forest Rose," abducted by Indians, vows to avenge his parents, and rescue the woman he loves. He is accompanied by Louis Wetzel, who at the time of the incident (1789) was the famous pioneer. The two men traced the band through what was then the pathless wilderness of the Northwestern Territory, come upon the Indians while asleep, and rescue the "Forest Rose." Later another band surprises them. Wetzel escapes, but the other two are captured. The band divides into two parties, each taking a prisoner with them. Wetzel trails the party which has Albert and, through his daring bravery the young man gains freedom again. The two men take up the search for Rose and in the course of their wanderings reach a small fort on the banks of the Hockhocking River. The commandant is in fear of an attack from the Wyandottes and, much to his relief, Wetzel and Albert agree to scout in that direction and learn what the Indians are doing.

The two scouts reach a place called Standing Stone, and from the lofty eminence see the Indian village on the plains below, and not far from them. They are able to observe the movements of the braves and gain much important information. Their canteens being nearly empty, Albert volunteers to go to a nearby stream and refill them. There he comes upon two Indian women, and fearing they will give the alarm, grapples with them. While they are struggling on the bank of the stream, Albert suddenly finds that the younger "squaw" is his "Forest Rose," for whom he had long been vainly hunting. In the excitement, the real squaw gets away, alarms the village, and hundreds of Indians surround Standing Stone, where the two white men are at bay.

Wetzel explains that their only one hope of success is to stand off the Indians until nightfall and then escape in the darkness. While the two men are planning the defense, Rose slips away and for awhile Wetzel believes she entered the village, quietly secured a gun and some ammunition, and from a place nearby aids in the defense by picking off many of the attacking Indians. At nightfall she returns, aids the white men to pass the sentries and escapes with them on horseback. The brave trio are followed, but after many hardships, reach the fort, where Albert and the "Forest Rose" are happily married.

THE EXHIBITOR'S PRIVILEGE

A TRENCHANT note in the interview with Mr. Neff in the November 16th issue of the News set me thinking, and, going back to several editorials I wrote eighteen months and two years ago, and on one or two ocasions since then, the thought came into my mind that they would bear repetition to-day. Mr. Neff said:

> "The fight that is now going on is in defense of the exhibitors, to secure their rights and relieve them from a condition, to say the least, which is, in our opinion, destructive to the best interests of the exhibitors, and the business in general, namely, two dollar license fee a week, and the discontinuance of service without notice. We believe that all makes of films should be run by an exhibitor if he so desires, regardless of any source whence opposition may come. No manufacturer or film exchange should be allowed to dictate to an exhibitor whether he should run Independent or License films, and this is all the exhibitors ask for—a square deal to all, with special privileges to none."

I want to make special note from the above and reiterate a statement I made some while ago, that all makes of films should be run by an exhibitor if he so desires, regardless of any source from whence they come. When I gave up the Moving Picture World and started the Moving Picture News in 1908 the keynote was, "The exhibitor first, middle and last," as he was and is the supreme dictator, or should be, in his own theatre. How can he be this in any sense of the word if he has to take what the exchange chooses to give him? He must rise up out of his lethargy, and through the National League obtain the rights that are justly his due, namely, the selection from any program on the market to-day. If he wants a Pathe Weekly, it should be his for the asking. If it is Gaumont, this should be given him; whether he is Licensed or unlicensed should not enter into the question at all. If he wants a film of any of the manufacturers in the market to-day, he should go to his exchange and demand that such film or such subject should be given to him, and not allow the dictatorial policy of manufacturer or exchange man to interfere with that which is most suitable for the benefit of his patrons, the public. No manufacturer or exchange man (again in the words of Mr. Neff) should be allowed to dictate to an exhibitor whether he should run Independent or Licensed films. He should be absolutely free to choose for himself.

Some may say this means an open market. It surely does mean that. Why not? I would like to ask. Is not this a free country? Is it not the boast of every American citizen that he is free to act, or choose, or believe as he likes, providing it does not trench upon the rights, liberties and consciences of his fellowmen? How can the exhibitor act as above if there is not an open market from which to make his selection? I was in a theatre the other day and saw flashed on the screen one reel of Selig, one reel Vitagraph, one reel Majestic, one reel Imp, and one Gaumont. A most varied program and a very choice one. How did this exhibitor get this service? That I do not know, but it was there, and no action has been taken by either section to put this exhibitor out of business; and if one exhibitor can do this, why not the ten thousand and one? Why should not the exhibitor receive what he demands, namely, a square deal to all, with special privileges to none?

Factions and schisms in the industry have tended to tie up, cramp and belittle the art of Cinematography, and if an open market were an accomplished fact it would be the survival of the fittest in every respect. One exhibitor told me, in the course of conversation, that one week he was Independent, another Licensed, then again Independent and again Licensed, ringing the changes week in and week out as he thought his program needed, and he struck a keynote when he said "the Licensed people have educated the public up to their standard by putting out good pictures and by judicious advertising. The other side neglects this educational propaganda, and if they would put more money into their films instead of so much waste paper, which only helps to fill my refuse basket, I think I would stick to the Independent because they mean progress." From this I reason the exhibitors have vast power in their hands, and if they will only wield it in the advancement and uplift of the industry they will reap the benefit.

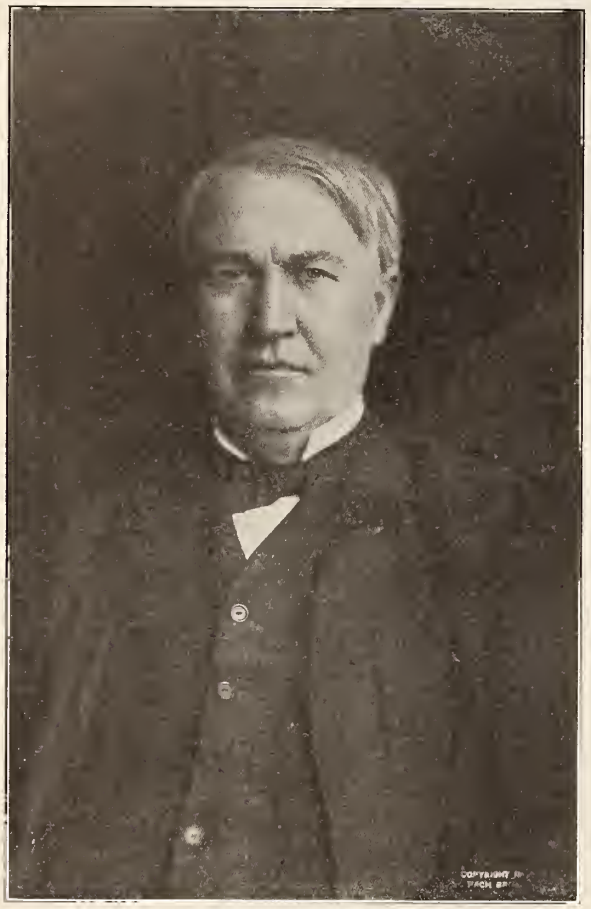
THOMAS A. EDISON

RUMORS, and rumors of rumors, have been so filling the air from irresponsible newspaper men, that I felt it a bounden duty, for the benefit of my readers, to pay Thomas A. Edison a visit at his laboratory in Orange. I had a most delightful trip and interview. In the course of conversation, I asked Mr. Edison if the rumors were correct regarding his assuming full control of all the allied Edison interests, and his reply was, "Absolutely; I have taken full control and am feeling younger every day and more capable of controlling my own business." We left him with a promise of further information at a later stage, and then visited Mr. C. H. Wilson, the general manager of Thomas A. Edison, Inc., requesting from him a statement regarding the resignation of Mr. Frank L. Dyer from the executive management. After an interesting conversation with him, he handed me the following statement, and my readers may take this as authoritative and authentic:



THOMAS A. EDISON

"Mr. Dyer, besides having the executive management of many of Mr. Edison's companies, had other interests which demanded part of his time. These interests have grown so extensive of late that he has felt for some time that he was unable to do full justice to the multitudinous duties which his various connections involved, and, as a duty to himself, to Mr. Edison, and to the enterprises with which he was connected, decided that he must curtail his numerous responsibilities.

"After reflection he came to the conclusion that he would withdraw from his service with the Edison companies, and therefore tendered his resignation to Mr. Edison, who accepted it with regret.

"The details of the business of the Edison Company at Orange have been in the hands of Mr. C. H. Wilson as general manager for a number of years, and he will retain his position, and in addition has been made vice-president of the company. Mr. Edison takes the presidency in order that he may direct the policy of the company, in addition to the technical details, which he has always had charge of. No other changes in officials or personnel of the company will be made."

Next, in the round of visits, I made a call upon my old friend, Mr. John Pelzer, asking him about the rumors of his resigning from the Edison Company as the manager of sales. How this canard got around the trade is a very moot question. Mr. Pelzer is still large as life, as the following cut will show:

JOHN PELZER

In conversation with him, he said that it was as far as possible from his intentions or mind to resign from the sales management, and still further away, and one of the most remote possibilities is that the Edison Company are discontinuing the manufacture of their projecting machines. They are perfecting devices to make the machine still more valuable, and under the management of Mr. John Pelzer the Home and the Professional Kinetoscopes have been combined under his management Of course this will mean a duplication of work, particularly in the traveling forces. The exchange man and exhibitor can look forward to extra push on the part of the Edison Company for both machines.

This visit to Orange was a combination of surprises. As I was leaving the office I almost fell into the arms of my good friend, Paul Cromelin, formerly of the Columbia Company, but now the manager of the London office of the Edison Phonograph Department, with whom I had a good chat regarding old times and present conditions. He had with him Mr. Graff, the foreign representative of the company, and they together were paying a flying visit to the works. Mr. Cromelin leaves on the Mauretania on the 27th, to again take up his active duties in the London office, so that, on the whole, my visit to Orange was a propitious and profitable one, as, in addition to the above information, I had the pleasure of hearing a phonographic record which was absolutely free from any jarring or metallic sound, and made on the new base, which they call "Condensite," and which bids fair to revolutionize the phonographic industry.

CREATING AN OPEN MARKET

A not unexpected issue has taken rise among a number of American and foreign manufacturers which will be another turn in the long lane. We understand that some five American manufacturers and nine European manufacturers have come to an agreement whereby they will come with their product into the open market, releasing twenty-one releases weekly as a starter. They will commense releasing the first of the coming year, or probably sooner.

THE FACE AT THE WINDOW

Solax

Nina Auvray's childhood and youth have been lonely, spent with an eccentric and miserly old uncle. Report says that old Auvray, in spite of his meanness, is very rich, and that little Nina will one day inherit a large fortune. The house they occupy is an old-time dilapidated mansion which has, for generations, belonged to the Auvrays, and which is falling to pieces for lack of repair. The grounds are magnificent, but illy kept by shiftless help.

Old Auvray dies suddenly. No will can be found. If ever one was executed, the lawyers have died or moved long since. Sweet Nina, shocked, left entirely to her own resources, is compelled to advertise the old home. A fine fellow, plenty of money, and fond of shooting, buys the place while Nina engages board in the village and secures a position as teacher in the village school.

Nina, while outwardly brave, is very unhappy. She pines for the rambling house, and the trees, and the birds. At times she creeps up the hill and tearfully gazes at the closed windows and doors. Once, looking warily about, she enters the house and goes through the rooms. Finally overcome, she throws herself on the sofa and has a good cry. It is here the new tenant finds her. Much distressed, he comforts her. Thus their acquaintance starts.

Young Grey immediately sets about the repair of the old home and grounds. He retains two or three hands about the place. One fellow, surly, and a hard drinker, Grey learns to distrust. After repeated and kind warnings regarding drunkenness, Lem Casey is discharged. He leaves, cursing Grey.

Grey, meanwhile cultivates Nina's acquaintance, learns to love her, and finally pleads with her to return to her old home as his wife.

Nina, beautiful in her new-found joy, is roaming through the woods when she overhears Casey and a pal cursing and talking. Casey has planned to shoot Grey that night and is gloating over the fact that Grey always sits by his desk writing, within direct range of the south window. Casey is very drunk. (Hedge conceals the girl.)

Nina terrified, runs straight to her old home, waits for Grey to return, and in an ecstasy of terror and tears, tells him all she's heard. Grey is at first incredulous, but the girl convinces him of the dangerous character of Casey.

Grey telephones for a couple of officers. Together they fix up a dummy at Grey's desk, leaving the window invitingly open. Grey and the men hide in the thicket. Darkness falls. Lem Casey, staggering but cautious, approaches. After waiting and waiting, he creeps within range of the stooping figure at the deck. He shoots. The figure topples over to the floor. Casey turns to flee and is knocked flat by the man he supposed he had murdered.

The next day in locating the bullet, a secret panel is discovered, containing the lost will. Nina is a rich woman, and all ends happily.

SOMETHING MORE ABOUT THE EXHIBITORS' BALL

Owing to the shortness of time before going to press, we were unable to do justice to the above event in our last issue, but will at this writing endeavor to give our readers a more concise idea of what really did happen.

The second annual ball of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of New York City, given on the night of November 14, at Palm Garden, Fifty-eighth street, near

SAMUEL H. TRIGGER
President

Lexington, was one of the most tremendous affairs of its kind ever held in New York City so far as members were concerned, and equally so in enjoyment. From the first festive note to the last, which, by the way, happened in the "wee sma' hours," there was a never-ending flow of fun, laughter, and general enjoyment. Not a guest was there in that vast throng of some 6,000 people, more or less, who did not at least appear to be in the very glow of enthusiasm and light-heartedness.

And not only was the motion picture trade most wonderfully and splendidly represented there, but others, representative of important city departments, lent their presence to this gala event. Quoting from the brief report given by our editor in last week's issue:

"Everybody, who was anybody," in the motion picture industry in New York City, allied with the art, directly or indirectly, was present at the monster ball given by the Exhibitors' League of New York City, at Palm Garden, Thursday, November 14. Special mention must be made of Chief Justices Russell and Duell, representing the bench. The city authorities were represented by Corporation Counsel Chief Wallace, of the Board of Water, Gas and Electricity; the aldermen by Alderman Folk.

"We noticed among the manufacturers Carl Laemmle, president of the Universal; Pat Powers, vice-president, and his henchman, Tom Evans. The Film Supply was represented by President Aitken, Harry Raver and Joe Miles, Herbert and Madame Blache. The Feature Film Companies by H. A. Spanuth, A. J. Danziger, Herbert Miles and, of course, Mrs. Miles, and Attorney Kepler. Among the machine people we noticed Eric Morrison, of the Standard; Mr. Clark, of the Motiograph; Mr. Coles, of Powers, and Frank Cannoch, of the Simplex. Special mention must be made of the presence of the president of the National League, M. A. Neff, who made quite an interesting address, which was preceded by the presentation of a loving cup to Sam Trigger, the indefatigable president of the New York Exhibitors' Association.

"Newspaper men were there galore. The World was represented by Joseph Hoff and H. Von Harleman; the Clipper by Arthur Ray; the Morning Telegraph by Johnstone and Farnam, and the Moving Picture News by all of its staff. To all whom we talked the verdict was success and full enjoyment."

The manufacturers were represented by actors and actresses galore, many of whom added to the entertainment of the audience in a most delightful manner.

Among those who stepped forth on the stage, filling with rare delight the hearts of the picture "fans," were the inimitable Flora Finch with Kate Price at her side, Florence Turner, who gave a monologue, imitating a department store salesgirl; Billy Quirk, in stories and jests, which created much merriment; Kenneth Casey, the popular boy player of the Vitagraph; Marie Thanhouser, Edward O'Connor, King Baggot, Vivian Prescott, Pearl White, Jane Fearnley, Maurice Costello, John Bunny and many others.

From the boxes shone forth a galaxy of bright eyes, and smiles of equal brightness. A pretty figure in the assemblage was Florence La Badie in the Thanhouser box. Miss La Badie indeed presented a rare picture of delicate beauty and refinement, as she sat in quiet dignity, enfolded in a rose-colored satin wrap, taking in the situation

"Little Mary" also looked as she always looked, a unique little figure. She was attired in a combination of buttercup and white. Florence Turner also wore a becoming costume of yellow with a graceful pearl embroidered tunic. Flora Finch wore pink and pale green. Among

THE TRUANT'S DOOM

By VIRGINIA WEST

(Adapted from Thanhouser Release)

"MOTHER," said Tommy quite seriously, "I don't think this is the time for boys to go to school."

"Why not, Tommy?" asked his mother, apparently as serious.

"Well, you see it ain't the right kind of weather. It hurts a feller too bad to go to school this kind of weather."

"I'm sorry, son, but I'm afraid we won't be able to change things. You had better try to make the best of it for you must start tomorrow."

"But, mother, just let me wait a little while. I—I don't think I'm well enough to go to school now."

Mrs. Green suppressed a smile. "Well, perhaps you will be better tomorrow," she said.

Never was captive led to his doom more miserable than Tommy when the next morning came, and he was marched off to school. He tried to seem ill, but his appetite was too good and his desire to be out of doors too strong.

His desk was by a window, and Tommy could look out across a vacant lot and beyond to a field and a wood and a sparkling stream.

The magic in the September air kept calling to him so that his mind just wouldn't stay on his lesson. What in the world was the use, anyway, to learn out of a silly book that "John and Ma-ry went to the woods to gath-er flowers?" What did he care about John and Mary? He knew where the chestnuts were—fine big ones—and he wanted to go see about them before the frost. And the persimmons, too. It was always best to have the biggest ones well located. Then the fish should be seen to—and the tadpoles. Tommy wondered if the tadpoles had gone into the mud yet. He thought not, but then he didn't know, and he ought to know.

Oh, dear, there were so many things a boy ought to do in September, and instead of giving him plenty of time to do it, the grown people filled up all his days with a lot of foolish stuff out of books.

So, instead of studying about John and Mary, he divided his time between looking out of the window and drawing pictures of birds, and frogs, and snakes, and things, on the margin of his book.

This sort of thing went on for three days. The teacher tried every means of persuasion, but Tommy remained unmoved by the interests of the hall of learning.

On the morning of the fourth day, Tommy's seat in the schoolroom was vacant. The lure of a little path crossing the corner of a vacant lot and disappearing through a hole in the fence to thread its way, as Tommy knew, across a field to the woods, was too much for him. In a moment the despised books were hidden in a clump of weeds and the boy was far along the path.

Oh, the freedom of it! The sun shone with that clear, sharp brightness that comes in September. The path that Tommy walked along wandered through a field of ironweed and goldenrod, with here and there a bit of Queen Anne's lace or fennel.

The insects buzzed and whirred from flower to flower in the most delightful way, and Tommy's heart sang louder and louder with each step.

Across the field the bob-whites called, and the crows discussed their coming journey.

At the edge of the wood on the other side of the field there was just the loveliest stream in the world. Tommy would rather wander along that stream or lie on its banks than do anything else you could possibly think of.

So, now he threw himself down upon his stomach and gazed into the clear sparkling water. He stirred a few leaves at the bottom of a little pool. No, the tadpoles had not gone into the mud yet. And the crawfish were just as lively as ever. There came a big fellow out from under a stone—and look at that! He had lost a claw. Tommy poked him and he backed away. Some small fish came swimming up and nibbled at his fingers.

The time passed very quickly in the bright sunshine, and before Tommy knew what had happened to him he felt a strong desire for food. He might get some green nuts, he thought. They were about the only green thing that a fellow could eat that time of year. Even green walnuts sometimes make your mouth a little sore, but it would get well again. He guessed he'd try some in a little while. Just now he wanted to lie in the sun. It was just lovely and warm.

Tommy rolled over on his back and looked up at the sky. It was most too bright for his eyes, so he closed them.

Oh, it was nice to lie there in the warm sun and hear the stream rippling and the insects humming around his head.

"Gee, but I'm glad I'm not in school," thought Tommy. And then he began to wonder what the others were doing and what the teacher thought about his not being there, and then he just simply couldn't help wondering what his mother would say when she found out he didn't go to school. He knew she would know for she always knew everything he did.

All of a sudden Tommy saw someone coming across the field. Nearer and nearer he came—no, they—there were two of them. They came near enough for Tommy to see that they had on uniforms. Then he saw that they were constables, and they were coming right after him.

He tried to run, but somehow his legs that had been so nimble a short while ago refused to move now. He tried frantically to run, but it was no use. Nearer and nearer and nearer they came, until they pounced right upon him. They were great big men, like giants, and they jerked Tommy up from the ground and said, both together, "Are you Tommy Green?" And Tommy just couldn't say that he wasn't. So he said 'Y—y—yes, sirs."

"Well, you just come along with us," they said, and they each took an arm and just dragged him across the field so fast that his legs dragged along in the air behind him.

Then they took him into a big room where there were lots of chairs and a platform with some big chairs on it and a great, great big man sitting on one of them, behind a desk.

This man looked something like Tommy's brother's bulldog and something like an old owl he saw sitting on a tree a few days ago. He looked very wise and very stern.

The two constables threw Tommy down onto the floor in front of the judge's desk. "There he is!" they both exclaimed at once in a voice that almost made Tommy deaf. He felt himself shrinking into a very, very small boy.

The judge sat forward on his chair and leaned far over his desk. Adjusting his glasses he looked hard at Tommy and said in a deep, growling voice, "So you are the bad boy who put his books in the weeds and played hookey?"

"Y—y—yes, sir," said the trembling Tommy.

Turning to a lady who stood near, the judge said, "Madame, is this your little boy?"

The lady turned so that Tommy could see that it was his own mother, and she looked at him and said in a voice Tommy had never heard, "He was my little boy, but I don't want him any more. I don't want a little boy who runs away from school; you may do whatever you like with him."

And in the twinkling of an eye the two big constables had grabbed Tommy and whisked him away to a cell in the jail.

It was all cold and damp in the cell and Tommy didn't know what to do but to stand up, and he got very tired of doing that.

Presently there came a bent little man with a face like a rat and the color of the grey stones, dragging behind him a huge bunch of keys. One of these he lifted and opened the door to Tommy's cell.

"Off with your clothes, off with your clothes," demanded the jailer.

Tommy obeyed and the weazened little man produced a striped suit and commanded him to put it on.

Oh, he was so ashamed, but there was nothing for him to do but to put on the clothes and give his own to the jailer.

When the door clanged to on the man and the keys, Tommy sat down and just didn't know what to do.

"What's the matter, kid?" he heard a deep, gruff voice ask.

Tommy looked up and there stood a man as big as the constables dressed in a striped suit just like his.

"Do you want to get out of here?" asked the man.

"Well, I—I would—like to," answered Tommy.

"Have you got nerve?" was the next question.

"Yes, I haveñ but I'm in her for a pretty bad crime," Tommy confessed.

"What?"

Tommy leaned forward and whispered, "I played hookey!"

The man recoiled in horror.

"What did you do?" asked Tommy.

"Oh, I only killed a man, so I'm going to get out of here."

"Can I go, too?"

The man looked doubtful for a time.

"Well," he said finally, "I don't like to associate with your class, but I'll do it this time."

Tommy was relieved although very much ashamed. "How can you get out?" he inquired.

Oh, just like this." The man went to the window and took one iron bar after another between his hands and broke them like sticks of candy. "Come on, quick," he called in a deep whisper.

He picked Tommy up and quietly dropped out of the window with him.

Just then they heard an alarm given and away they sped. In a moment their enemies were after them. They ran and ran and ran up hill and down valley over and over again, until at last they came to the bank of a river. Tommy was very tired and sat down to rest—and to think, too, how he could cross the river. He didn't know how to swim. He was wondering if his companion would take him across.

Down the last hill the pursuers were coming. Just as they were upon them the big man leaped into the river.

"Shall I shoot?" asked one of the enemy.

"No," answered another. "He only killed a man. Let him go. We have to attend to this man here."

They took Tommy by the shoulders and roughly stood him up on the river bank.

"Ready, men," said the chief to the others. "Shoot him—shoot him good."

They fired and the hardened criminal fell backwards into the cold water.

"Ugh!"

Tommy opened his eyes quickly. One hand had dropped into the water. He sprang to his feet and looked about him. "Oh, gee, ain't I glad I was only dreamin'," he said aloud. "I guess I'll go back to school."

Without waiting for anything he started on a run for the schoolhouse, pausing only long enough to grab up his books.

"Teacher," he said breathlessly, when he had reached her side, "Teacher, I couldn't come before, but I feel like workin' now. Oh, I'll just love to work. Give me some hard sums and see if I can't do 'em."

During the past few months the Chicago Studios of the Selig Polyscope Co. have made several additions to the membership of their regular stock company. Among the new members thus secured are: Miss Rose Evans and Messrs. Jack Nelson, LaFayette McKee, Colin Reid, Thomas Flynn, T. J. Commerford, Julius Frankerburg, Carl Winterhoff, Charles H. France, Mac Barnes, and Harry Lonsdale. Most of these well-known and competent players have already attained large followings through their various appearances with the Selig Co. in the past.

The most recent addition to the scenario department of the Selig Polyscope Co. is Mr. J. Edward Hungerford, who for some time past has been a contributor to the department which he has now joined. Among the more recent scenarios produced by the Selig Co. which emanated from the pen of Mr. Hungerford are "A Man Among Men," "The Voice of Warning," "Bread Upon the Waters," "Under Suspicion." The addition of this well-known writer to the already famous scenario department of the Selig Co. once again demonstrates that company's policy of giving all that is best in motion picture production.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.—A contract has been let for the erection of a new moving picture theatre at the northeast corner of Locust and 60th street on ground sold by Jno. C. Knox.

GAUMONT FEATURES

The Gaumont Company are putting out a series of States rights propositions which promise to fill the bill with the usual Gaumont gusto.

"The Perils of the Atlantic," a tremendously interesting and spectacular film, in two reels, is quite startling in some of the effects produced through clever photography and stagecraft. The following is a brief sketch of the story:

James Trevor, on the eve of departure for America to visit an agency, delays taking passage on a Transatlantic steamship, due to a warning from a friend advising him to postpone his voyage because of the jeopardy to ocean traffic from icebergs.

Mrs. Trevor, at a friend's house, meets a palmist, then being received by fashionable society. The palmist for some inscrutable reason refuses to employ her arts on

The palmist's gaze raised from the hand outstretched before her to the dark, troubled eyes of Mrs. Trevor. "A hand of which there is much to be said but which is not for me to tell," were her portentous words.

the palm of Mrs. Trevor. She does, however, agree to an engagement. The prophecy Mrs. Trevor receives is a fearful one. With sinking heart the wife and mother hears that she is to lose one to her near and dear. "Will it be my husband or my son?" is the tremulous query which reverberates through her brain.

Mr. Trevor seeing an advertisement for the "Colossus," the largest steamship in the world, just about to make her maiden trip, departs on her.

The "Colossus," however has not gone far on her journey when she strikes an iceberg and sinks with most of her passengers aboard.

The wife of Mr. Trevor and his young son are so tremendously shocked by the news that the little one becomes very ill. Mrs. Trevor doubly grief-stricken miagines that she is to lose both husband and son. However, eventually the glad tidings that her husband has been saved reaches her, and she is momentarily glad, but still depressed, and under the influence of what the palmist has told her, she fears for her little son.

Seeing his niece's condition, an old uncle of Mrs. Trevor concocts a scheme to destroy her faith in the palmist, and makes an appointment with her to have his niece's hand read telling the palmist that the young woman in question is about to be married. They go at the time appointed, and, forced to read Mrs. Trevor's hand through the opening of a curtain, her identity being thereby hidden, the palmist exactly reverses her former prophecy.

Her trickery unmasked, the palmist is sent away discomfited, while the relieved mother hastens back to her wounded dove. The father arrives and his presence acts as a tonic most efficacious. The child quickly rallies to bring joy again to the household over which the Sword of Damocles had menacingly hung.

THIS is the season for Thanksgiving, when the Balkan allies are dismembering Turkey and making hash of it, and the Powers are enacting the role of gobbler. We cannot all have turkey but Cinematography has due cause to give thanks. The art has made rapid advancement the past year; the pictures are becoming more dignified and entertaining; trade has enlarged by leaps and bounds; and the industry has assumed prime importance. Everyone connected with Cinematography has good reason to give thanks and to observe Thanksgiving. Selah!

* * * *

Sometimes we become so depressed over the general outlook that we are absolutely certain that if we should ever get to go to that world's perfect picture, so often referred to as on the way, that we should have on a new union suit and couldn't enjoy it. However, we give thanks just the same.

* * * *

Last month we slipped over a little article to the "Photoplay Author" in which we asserted that "topnotchers" liken unto Script Editors Warren, Hoadley, Vinton, Reid, Plimpton and Sargent were "emotional." Also that some of them were formerly Thespians. Now comes Epes Winthrop Sargent, who charges us with libel. We stick to the emotional outburst. When you put your soul into your work, inspiration and emotion emanates therefrom. We well remember when Hal Reid took the center of the stage in "The Knobs of Tennessee" or something like that; Vinton started in vaudeville; Warren has carried more than one spear; Plimpton engaged in amateur theatricals, and Hoadley was formerly a political editor; Sargent occasionally takes the best platform rocker into the cellar and opens the tool chest. Cause for emotion? Indeed yea!

* * * *

We wish to give thanks right here for the pleasure of reading some of that "fawncy" press stuff sent out by Stanley H. Twist, official "dopester" for the Selig Company. To our mind, there is not a better press agent in the business than Twist. His stories are all dignified and interesting. In other words, he tells the truth.

Moving picture theatre patrons will be thankful when the operator permits the title of a picture to remain long enough on the screen to be read. This little matter has been touched upon before but in two out of every three picture theatres entered, the fault is noticed. Titles should be shown at least ten seconds and there should also be a brief pause between plays.

* * * *

At least one film with a moral lesson in it, per program, would be received with thankfulness. It need not be heavy or serious, but it could be decked with a kindly thought or an inspiring sentiment. The people really like a picture that illustrates a noble humanity and that makes life pleasing and attractive. At a picture theatre the other evening, there was nothing in it but laughter and Indian horror. Laughter is good, plenty of it, but nothing but laughter is silly. Put in a refreshing thought now and then and it will elevate laughter. A man who is everlastingly laughing is apt to lose his brains. Psychologically speaking, it is an enemy to sustained thinking. Let us have some of the human graces pictured at every show. People like them. They like to have the children see them. They are really the true part of life which the moving pictures cannot afford to neglect. It might neutralize some of the bad tendencies.

Some things to be thankful for:

That Mrs. Fiske will pose for moving pictures.

That Mr. Stoddard is again editing a full page of photoplay matter in the Cleveland Sunday Leader, first city newspaper to institute such a department.

That the "Photoplay Author" will enlarge and will publish a series of articles from the pen of "Pop" Hoadley.

That the "schools" for picture play authors are on the run at last.

That with the porch swing abandoned for the season, one must go to the picture show to get the news.

That cowboy pictures promise to become fewer.

That Evangelist Billy Sunday says picture shows are all right.

When a bright young girl meets the sad-eyed person who writes the editorial paragraphs for the trade journal her father takes, she invariably starts the conversation by observing that she simply doesn't understand how he can think of something new to write every week, and he is seldom frank enough to reply that he can't.

Virginia Harned is quoted as saying that those theatre reformers who desire to have all manner of applause eliminated from a performance are running on the wrong track, and that if ever total silence is enforced on an audience, acting will decline. She says that actors and actresses take personal satisfaction in applause and that it inspires them to their best efforts. This may be true. But what about the actors and actresses who pose in moving pictures? Some of the best artists in the theatrical profession will be found in the moving picture casts of characters. Acting in moving pictures has not declined, but on the other hand, has greatly improved. These artists have not the applause of large audiences to stimulate them and nevertheless their work is artistic. We think they are entitled to great credit.

Some readers of newspapers may regret in the news from the Balkan war such vivid word pictures as the old-time correspondents, Archibald Forbes, for example, were wont to send. The war correspondents are on the scene but there is a strict censorship. But the new "war correspondent," the moving picture camera man, is on the scene and has been turning the crank in the thick of the fray. We shall have actual scenes displayed, scenes of war's horrors that could illy be described with the pen or pencil. Think of the dangers braved by these camera men in order that you can be interested and instructed in your cozy picture theatre. War has its dangers to those who report it as well as those who engage in it. Lloyd's which insures about everything, considers the occupation of the moving picture camera man so perilous that it will insure them only at about fifty per cent. premium.

We read in one of the magazines recently the suggestion that "Gulliver's Travels" will be pictured. It is a good suggestion, and such a picture of Dean Swift's satire would be a valuable addition to the educational classics being filmed. Gulliver had some strenuous experiences and, strange as it may appear, there are just as many Lilliputians in the world to-day as there were when Gulliver traveled!

Horace Vinton, well-known script editor, has turned his attention to magazine writing, and recently had a short story accepted by one of the leading magazines entitled: "Vas Ist Los Mit Hermanno?" We don't know what this means but it sounds good. The story is evolved about an incident in Mr. Vinton's early life at the Leipsic Conservatory of Music. Many of the better known picture playwrights and editors are successful magazine writers, and others are entering the field of fiction. Bannister Merwin wrote magazine yarns before he ever picturized, and so did Epes Sargent and "Pop" Hoadley. Mrs. Breuil has long been successful in the field of fiction. By the way, we have drawn checks from three monthly magazines ourself this month, and—maybe we are becoming too enthusiastically emotional!

THE FUTILITY OF FOISTING THE SINS OF OUR NETHER SELVES UPON THE SUGGESTIVENESS OF VIRILE MOTION PICTURES

By John B. Clymer

(Advertising Manager, Gaumont Company)

In the stone age it is probable that the children of the Cave men blamed their mischievous acts upon the distracting appearance of the dinosauria. It is likely that the juveniles of Sodom and Gomorrah pointed the finger of accusation to art in the nude as a cause for their remiss conduct. In our boyhood the dime or the nickel novel was the much-blamed source of the sins of the younger generation, who in emulation of Diamond Dicks, Nick Carters and Old Sleuths bought large revolvers and Bowie knives and proceeded to reduce the population in their immediate neighborhood. There is now a new "goat," the motion picture, and if little Willie or "young hopeful" Mary, lacking the surefootedness of a chamois or a tight-rope walker, deviates from the straight and narrow path, he or she raises his youthful tones and blames it on the "movies." It is history repeating itself and has been popular since Eve handed Adam the red cheeked apple and told him it was good for his digestive organs. Adam in subsequent conservation with the Holy Ghost, with a manliness repugnant to we of higher ideals, generally deposited the reprehension on the shoulders of Eve. But it did not "get by" then, and with the thinking people of to-day, the idea of attributing to motion pictures the reason for juvenile delinquency it will not be sustained. The fact is that every boy and girl, every woman and child, has a proportion of the innate "cussedness" which seems to support the theory that we average twenty-five per cent devil, seventy-five per cent God, and that mischief and trouble "will out" whether the cause of excitement and temptation is dinosauria or motion pictures.

Mr. Frank E. Holliday, managing editor of the Gaumont Weekly, recently showed the writer a copy of a newspaper story with a Camden, N. J., date line, quoting the statement of two youths under sentence of death for murder, who are said to have stated that they would have never thought of holding up and killing their victim had it not been for the "movies."

If we are to follow this analogy, all literature dealwith the realistic in life will have to be turned out of the libraries and shooed away from the printing presses. If our literature and our motion picture dramas are to be so expurgated of facts of experience that robbery and multiform dartardy are blue penciled, we will bring art down to the stimulating level of a pink tea. As criminologists will tell, there must have been in the minds and characters of the two youths a strong inclination toward crime. It is improbable that all that was needed to focus and energize this inclination was a motion picture of strong action. The youths have not seen fit to search their souls or to analyze their psychological or metaphysical processes, or they would have understood that any nature of a higher order could hardly be moved to crime by a motion picture. Literature of violence and the motion picture of violence usually paint a dark and sinister aftermath for the criminal. He almost inevitably "gets it" and the precept of rectitude is significantly drawn. To the right-minded person, pictures of the untoward depictions of the lower strata of human life, are a bulwark for probity and honor.

There are abuses of every good thing, and it is well for the motion picture producer as for the literary man to choose his narrative with discretion. But the fact remains salient that we cannot denature of red blood our motion picture dramas for the gratification of over-solicitous persons who would make of our boys a nation of mollycoddles so weak that expositions of crime serve only to lead them into, instead of out of it. As is usual after such affairs there is the usual hue and cry regarding stringent legislation to forbid motion pictures of vivid power in portrayal of our worse selves. There is now the liability that the city of Camden-by-the Delaware will enact a statute providing for a heavy penalty in the form of fine and imprisonment for the exhibition of a picture depicting a crime. This law, the newspapers say, will be passed by the local council and will become effective in December.

This is a corollary to the habits of parents in not acquainting their children with the facts of sex, the subject so much in taboo that the child has to gather his knowledge from the streets, a gleaning not likely to be advantageous either to his health or to his morals.

If this law is enacted in Camden, motion picture houses in that worthy city will be restricted to pictures of lovers billing and cooing under the goo-goo tree; of the wild stimulus of grown-up boys playing tiddledywinks; of gentlemen with long black flowing ties crocheting in the comfy-cozy light of the sitting-room lamp; of equally domestic gentlemen avidly reading a copy of Home Needlework; of milk and water drama where the villain villainously indicates that he will slap the man if the latter does not surrender his bank roll. Instead of giving to patrons heralds of coming features, tracts will be handed around and evangelists will hold short snappy meetings, saving souls between reels.

COMING KLEINE RELEASES

Three excellent split reels, composed of first-class comedies and interesting travelogue subjects, will be placed upon the market by George Kleine this coming week.

For the Tuesday Cines, "All on a Summer's Day" describes a series of delightful and amusing incidents which take place at a house party in the country. There is an abundance of pretty girls and handsome men, which with the unusually attractive settings, would make any ordinary film a success, but, adding to this the fact that the story itself is clever, a very presentable release is offered, which will add quality and variety to any program. The climax of the story, where both the hero and heroine win their wagers, each entirely unsuspicious of the other's purpose, is very ingeniously worked out. Alfred Bracci and Dorothy Ferreri, two of the best known Cines players, enact their roles in their usual satisfactory fashion.

The reel is completed by an interesting travelogue, "The Beautiful Valley of the Tronto," taking us upon a delightful trip, starting at the source of the river, down through the valley, which contains so many picturesque old castles, and other fascinating ruins of the past.

"A Man for a Day" is the Eclipse offering for Wednesday. The film describes the adventures of a mischievous boy, who wishes to dress and conduct himself as a man. After withdrawing all his savings from the bank, he carefully arrays himself in evening clothes and goes to the races, where he wins a small fortune. He is unable to stand prosperity, however, for he soon gets into all sorts of scrapes before a kind policeman discovers the young rascal and promptly escorts him to his alarmed parents, who administer a punishment which he will not soon forget. The role of the boy is very well taken, and several of the scenes, such as that at the race track, are unusually interesting.

"Trebizond and Surroundings," depicting many scenes in and about the town of Trebizond in Asia Minor, fills out the necessary thousand feet.

The Saturday Cines, "A Comedy of Errors," is an extremely amusing subject, which ought to bring many laughs from the audiences. It describes the comical adventures of two raw recruits, who are made the butt of much ridicule by the other troopers in the regiment. The plot is not a new one, being wound around a case of mistaken identity, but is exceptionally well executed, and the public will certainly enjoy it.

The other subject on the reel is "Corneto Tarquinia." The film spreads before us many places of interest, which have been well preserved from medieval times, such as the Principal Gate, the beautiful Vitelleschi Palace, the National Square, St. Stephen's Square, the Great Tower, the Castle, and several remarkable views of the town.

Crystal Lake, Ill.—The new moving picture show owned by Pickett will be opened.

Independence, Mo.—A contract has been let to John E. Lewis on Maple avenue, Spring and Lexington streets, for the erection of a new opera house in this city.

St. Louis, Mo.—A contract has been let for the erection of a new Opera House in this city. Oscar Hammerstein's proposal.

Wilmington, Del.—Bevan Jordan, representing the Empire Amusement Co., signed a five-year lease on the Avenue Theatre at Delaware avenue and Tatnall street.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

A WORD FROM HOPP HADLEY.

YOU know Hopp Hadley? We thought so. There are but few writers in Filmland to-day who haven't appreciated the courteous treatment handed out to contributors by Editor Hadley, of the Majestic Motion Picture Company. Mr. Hadley is one of the leaders in the script reading profession and numbers his admirers by the hundreds. Editor Hadley writes as follows:

> There should be a great source of satisfaction to the picture playwright, and a strong incentive to hard work, in the fact that so many people are interested in his progress and anxious to pat him on the back and give him so many words of helpful criticism and encouragement. What other poor devil struggling to make his livelihood in his chosen profession has pages of space each week devoted to good wholesome advice, and expert opinions as to the best and easiest way for him to succeed? Deep thinking and conscientious hard work are absolutely essential to success in any line of endeavor. Imagine an architect getting inspiration and saying: "Ah! I have a great idea for the construction of a public building," and then spending a few hours in dashing it off on paper before presenting it for acceptance. Speaking in tones of thunder, to be heard in a whisper, that is the method of labor employed by an appaling number of writers who are men of intelligence and education. It must be because they do not realize the amount of competition encountered in the field of picture play writing. Their script, representing a few hours of actual labor, is placed on the editor's desk, nestling snugly between the offerings of noted contributors to the magazine and newspaper worlds—and they suffer accordingly. The grade of scenarios on the market is rapidly improving, thanks to the men who so ably edit the scenario departments of the several periodicals to the moving picture art.

Thankey, Hopp, on behalf of those men. Small favors thankfully received by them all, I assure you.

INSPIRATION.

"Writers who seek inspiration from newspaper articles should be careful not to be led astray. Most practiced writers declare that they get many of their plots from newspapers, but judging from the mass of crime plays submitted to the studios, picture play novices seem to derive their inspiration from the Police Gazette." The above is an extract from Editor Letendre's editorial in The Photoplay Author. There is many an obscure item in the newspaper that often will furnish a good idea germ. Many novices make the mistake of writing plays on the sensations of the day. The New York police scandal, the Balkan war and even the jailing of Jack Johnson have furnished rot which is being inflicted on the long-suffering script editors. It is the art of seeing and appreciating just a line or two in some newspaper item and working it up that makes newspaper study pay. The bona fide newspaperman can use newspaper ideas to better advantage than many others, for many of them dive through a pile of thirty or forty exchanges daily, and their professional eye is constantly peeled for the new and novel item.

A FLOURISHING PERIODICAL.

The Photoplay Author, published at Holyoke, Mass, will be doubled in size starting with the January number. Editor Letendre writes that he has any number of good things in store for his readers.

INVARIABLY WELCOME.

Beta Breuil, editor Vitagraph Company of America, writes:

> Just a word to acknowledge your very courteous endorsement and acknowledgment of my poor claims to recognition in the Photoplay World, and to assure you that I shall be glad at any time to contribute to your columns anything in my power which may be of interest to your readers.

We do not habitually use personal letters but we cannot refrain from informing Mrs. Breuil that she can contribute to these columns every week, if the spirit moveth her. Anything she may write is sure to be interesting and of value. In our humble estimation, Mrs. Breuil is without a peer to-day in her chosen line of work.

THE SPIRIT OF '76.

Epes Winthrop Sargent is advocating a Round Table for script writers. The Knights of the Round Table, in various territories, can exchange ideas of working methods and form mutual admiration societies. It is a mighty good thought and Mr. Matt Mereness, the Schoharie, N. Y., picture playwright, unconsciously touches upon the same idea in a communication to us. Writes Mr. Mereness:

> What pleases me is a letter from a "fellow worker," and in it there is not a single "kick" or editorial "knock." From way up along the rock-bound coast of Maine, from Belfast, comes such an encouraging, cheerful letter from a picture playwright who urges fraternalism. She says: "I am not writing for information and I think the cheerful spirit is becoming uppermost among script writers." She is one who has struggled up the hard, rough road of script writing, and is now perfectly willing to lend a hand to others and to give a word of encouragement to others. That's the spirit of '76. I am willing to receive these kind of letters without number and I give Mr. Wright license to tack my name and address to the statement.

Form a correspondence circle of script writers up your way, Mereness, and when you organize "The Knights of the Round Table" please report progress from time to time."

SHELLING THE STOCKADE.

Editor C. B. Hoadley has left Union Square and has unlimbered his typewriter and has begun to shell the Powers stocade with scripts. He is being ably supported by Ben Schulberg, who is looking after Rex needs. A good-looking stenographer is at present opening the bulky envelopes at the Universal clearing bureau and it took a moving van to cart the scripts to the new Universal headquarters. Hal Reir, whom the good-looking stenographer succeeded, is now animatedly working with the Animated Weekly staff and between times is visiting the President and other admirers in Washington, D. C.

CREDIT FOR AUTHORS.

We believe that every moving picture journal, publishing fictionized stories of the releases, should credit the name of the author as well as the manufacturer. This includes the Moving Picture News.

HOW HE GOT HIS START.

W. Hanson Durham, who is the author of a large number of popular picture plays, in a recent article says that some of his success is due to the fact that previous to his first picture play he was writing and selling short stories. He found his experience in the short story field a great help, and why not others as well, he asks. The argument that few short story writers have succeeded as picture playwrights is not well founded. Short story writers are now turning their attention to the picture play field and they are making their presence felt. Here is how Durham does it:

"I always use a slate to start with. I simply write the synopsis of the story on the slate—as briefly as possible—consistently. Then I study the synopsis on the slate and make it as perfect as possible, then from that I write my first three or four scenes on the slate—studying and strengthening each scene carefully. After I have got the script started on the slate to my satisfaction, I copy what I have written and continue on paper. When I have the first draft completed, I again go over it critically—carefully making such corrections as I think best, and when this is done to my satisfaction, I copy, making a carbon copy—on the typewriter—and send the original to the company which I think it is best suited for. It is well to bear in mind when writing a script that there are still certain limitations which can be learned from studying the better class of photo plays. Timeliness is another thing to consider. And above all—the disposition to work with a determination not to let disappointments and rejections discourage you. There are not any—even among the most successful picture playwrights—but who have some of their scripts come back. Some of my scripts which I considered far superior to some which have been accepted I have thus far been unable to sell, and there is a cause for it. If you send to a company which is in the market for material—something which they want, and it is original, even if there are some slight faults in the construction of it—if the plot is there, they will accept it and pay you what they consider it worth to them as it is presented. Of course you can expect and probably will be paid a better price for your work if, in addition to an original plot, you have presented it in such a form which enables the producers to get the most out of it without further work on their part. By this, I mean that often acceptable plots are presented in such a shape that they require considerable work to put in proper form. In this case, the author is paid only for the idea or plot—which leaves the producing company to perfect it to their own satisfaction. If such is the case one cannot expect to receive as much as they would had the plot been presented in a finished form."

MUSSY SCRIPTS.

Editors are complaining to us of the unusual number of mussy manuscripts being received. Scripts written in lead pencil, pen and ink, written on both sides of the paper and criss-cross, are common. Observe the ethics of the profession, typewrite your manuscript, prepare it attractively. Mussy scripts are never read.

IN SENDING SCRIPTS.

Again we urge writers to send their scripts to the script department of the film company and not addressed personally to any editor. There are constant editorial changes. Because you see an editor's name in type is no reason why you should address your scripts to him and not to the proper department. Observe this little point and prosper thereby.

ANTICIPATION.

Next week we are going to publish the picture of another good-looking editress who considers the scripts for another good-looking company. Really, we are proud of these young women who are achieving such successes at editorial desks. More power to 'em, we were about to exclaim—but they have plenty of power!

THE AMATEUR'S COPY

A. W. Thomas, the versatile associate editor of the Photoplay Magazine, writes:

> An editor can tell the "copy" of an amateur the moment he handles it; the telltale marks are there—handwriting, impossible situations, illogical over-to-Africa-and-back explanations, advice to the editor, set price on script and other "marks." So we urge writers to get the "business" and "papers" that will earn a passport into the editor's sanctum by applying thought, time, technique, action, newness and theme to their stories.

In other words, get out of the amateur class. Others have. "There's a reason."

A SUB-TITLE DISCOURSE.

Editor E. V. Brewster of the Motion Picture Story Magazine believes the proper place for a sub-title is usually at a place just preceding the incident and not at the beginning of a scene. But suppose the incident and the scene begin simultaneously?

THE BROTHER OF "THE BAT"

Forrest Halsey has written an interesting drama which will be released by the Reliance on November 30. The play deals with "The Big Brothers" society, an organized and incorporated charity having for its object the saving of juvenile delinquents. The society is composed of young men of good character in whose custody boys who appear in the children's courts are paroled. These young men are supposed to help the boys by being "big brothers" to them, giving advice and example, and in short, acting as an older brother would do to a younger one. The effect is sometimes twofold in that the boy helps to mould the character of the young man who has him in charge. This is a big and growing organization and is as yet but little known outside of New York, where it is doing fine work.

OPERATORS' CHAT

By Ralph Knaster

MOVING PICTURE MACHINE OPERATORS' UNION No. 1 OF NEW YORK

President—Robert Goldblatt.
Vice-President—James Daisie.
Recording Secretary—George Epstein.
Financial Secretary—Robert Levy.
Sergeant-at-Arms—Ed. Spinola.
Business Representative—Ralph Knaster.

Office—133 Third Avenue.
Telephone—Stuyvesant 572.

The Moving Picture Operators Union No. 1 of New York held their regular meeting on Monday, November 18, 1912, at Teutonia Hall, 66 Essex street. Before the meeting was called to order, Vice-President James Daisie told the boys that, owing to Brother Robert Goldblatt attending to business for the organization at Rochester, N. Y., the worthy president of No. 1 would not be present to preside at the meeting, and Vice-President Daisie waved the chair to Business Representative Ralph Knaster.

Chairman pro. tem. then called the meeting to order at 12:45 a. m. The meeting hall was well seated, showing a good attendance. The report of the committee that had attended the White Plains Central Body meeting on November 11, 1912, was read to the members and received applause. Every one was filled with joy to hear the news that the C. L. U. of White Plains had served justice to the Operators' Union No. 1, and that Central Body will always be remembered by the men who had received their rights.

A letter was received from Brother Robert Goldblatt from Rochester and was read to the body which gave them more spirit and received great applause. There were two new members obligated at the meeting and six applications read off and placed before the body for approval. The membership is growing rapidly, and should it continue so, it will only take a short time when the members will number 500, and in all probability it will number that many by the first of the new year.

The various committees appointed at previous meetings to attend to the tasks for which they were selected, reported progress, and John Rickard and Sy Brownstein, were appointed to take the places of two who were on the ball committee, now rejected, to act on said committee owing to the fact that one Robert Sanders was expelled from the organization and Jack Garlick, the other member on that committee, was under charges which are being investigated.

The meeting was adjourned at 3.40 a.m., taking two hours and fifty-five minutes to complete entire business of the organization.

No doubt after you have looked over the chat of the last issue, you have learned something that will at all times cause you to remember that it does not pay to always try and get the bull by the horns. Most of the moving picture operators read the chat weekly and were wondering why the Moving Picture Operators' Union No. 1 of New York did not try to do this. This work of grabbing the bull by the horns was left to Local No. 35. But they failed in their efforts and set them back quite some, so much that it will take them a long time to get over their exertion. Their main object was to try their utmost to cut off the head of the Moving Picture Operators' Union in the form of getting the proprietors of the White Plains Theatre to discharge Robert Goldblatt, the president of M. P. O. U. No. 1. He brought the case before the central body of that jurisdiction, which decided against Local 35. It was Mr. H. Williams' greatest ambition to take back the news to his local that he accomplished a great thing but his trials were in vain and the good ship Local No. 1, of the M. P. Operators returned from the clash victorious, and the first battle is over. Mr. Williams, of Local No. 35, will soon learn that it is a mighty dangerous job to grab the bull by the horns and it will take some time before he will get over the sore spot he has, though he is acting cheerfully; it is a part of his profession not to show that the shoe realy pinches.

A new method of get-rich-quick is in force in the spot light Union No. 35. They have a so-called death benefit fund. When a member of the Local dies his family is supposed to get $400, and the new branch men are taxed to make this amount payable.

Many complaints have been made that when the former Auxiliary was in existence Local No. 35 was always getting stronger in membership. But since they (Local No. 35) formed a new branch, members of the big Local are dying fact and it seems there is an epidemic in the big Local, for the members of the branch can hardly keep up to the taxation.

One branch man said he was just working to pay all taxation, and sometimes he must borrow the money to pay up. This member said he did not think the branch men are entitled to this fund, but they must pay the tax just the same.

NOTICE.

The Moving Picture Operators' Union No. 1 of New York will hold their annual entertainment and ball on February 10, 1913, at Palm Garden, 58th street and Lexington avenue. All the leading and well-known performers of the moving picture films will be present. Now, boys, you can get acquainted with the famous stars whose pictures you project upon the screen. Get ready for a good time.

Jacksonville, Tex.—John F. Morris is also constructing a brick building on Main street, to be used as a theatrical and picture show building.

AT NAPOLEON'S COMMAND

Kleine-Cines Feature in Two Reels—Released December 2, 1912

George Kleine will release on December 2, 1912, a spectacular war drama entitled "At Napoleon's Command." The film is one of those high-class historical subjects for which the Cines Company has made such an enviable reputation, putting us in mind of "Brutus," "Josephine," "Madame Roland," "Rameses, King of Egypt," and others.

The story is laid in the midst of Napoleon's campaigns, at the time when he was battling against the combined forces of nearly every monarch in Europe and was astounding the world by his military genius. The gallant Lieutenant Vidar is home on leave, but his pleasure is of short duration, for but a few days have passed when he receives a summons to join his regiment without delay. With solemn pledges of love, and of a safe return to his pretty sweetheart, Juliet, he embraces her tenderly, and hurries away to mingle with the vast crowds of soldiers marching to join Napoleon's main army.

MADAME ANDRE MEETS NAPOLEON

Two years elapse, and Vidar has not returned to his sweetheart, as he so faithfully promised. In the meantime, distress has visited the home of poor disappointed Juliet. Deserted and in actual want, she visits the camp of a regiment of soldiers quartered nearby, and begs for assistance. While she is being cared for, the pretty face and charming manner of the girl attract the attention of Sergeant Andre, who sympathetically listens to the story of her past life. She tells him of her misfortune, but fails to reveal to him the name of her false lover. Andre becomes infatuated with Juliet, and after an ardent wooing wins her consent to marry him and to make her home with his mother in Paris until his return from the war.

Four years later, Napoleon is at his magnificent palace at Fontainebleau, surrounded by a brilliant suite of officers and their wives, who delight to promenade in the beautiful gardens. Among the gay throng are Andre, who has been promoted to Field Marshal, and his wife, Juliet, the latter very proud of her gallant husband, who has become one of the Emperor's most trusted officers.

A magnificent reception takes place at the palace, during which Juliet is to realize one of the most cherished ambitions of her life—to be presented to the great sovereign. And it is indeed a scene of great splendor—the ladies arrayed in their costly gowns and priceless jewels, contrasted with the glittering uniforms of the officers, present a remarkable sight. All is extravagantly gay, and the hum of conversation is at its height, when suddenly the magic words "the Emperor!" are spread in a whisper throughout the assemblage, and Napoleon enters, bowing right and left to his awed guests. Juliet is soon introduced, and her happiness is supreme, when all at once while gazing radiantly into the gay throng, she is shocked at the sight of the face of Marshal Vidar, her false sweetheart, and when he is brought up to be presented she faints away and has to be carried from the room.

The next day Andre announces to his wife that he has invited Marshal Vidar to dine with him, for he and Vidar have become close friends. She is greatly shocked, and exclaims that she cannot receive him, thus revealing by her excuses that Vidar is the man that so cruelly wronged her in the past. Greatly incensed, Andre immediately seeks out Vidar, and, after insulting him, challenges him to defend his honor. A duel is arranged, but in the midst of the encounter, the Emperor, who had been secretly informed of the affair, appears, and sternly commands the officers to return to their regiments.

Not long afterwards, preparations are in progress for a great battle. The enemy outnumber the French forces, but Napoleon frantically exhorts his soldiers to fight desperately for France and their Emperor. On the eve of battle, the great commander retires to his tent, where he has vision after vision of the glory that success will bring to him on the morrow. At the break of day all is ready. The mass of the army move forward toward the enemy's line, the Emperor himself, seated upon his white charger, directing and inspiring his men to victory.

The advance is followed by a desperate charge, which causes the enemy's line to waver. Heavy guns are brought up from the rear, and the slaughter is begun in earnest. A terrible shower of lead streaming out from the angry mouths of the cannon wreaks frightful carnage, and soon the field is literally strewn with dead and dying.

Napoleon's wonderful nerve and unerring strategy in directing his troops have their effect. The final bayonet charge at the enemy's most vital point proves a fatal blow, and a great victory is won.

Roll-call reveals the vacancies in the ranks of the various regiments, and the two field marshals are numbered among the missing officers. Juliet searches for her husband upon the battlefield, and at last finds him at the point of death, and near him Vidar, who is also desperately wounded. When the two officers are laid side by side, Andre begs his wife to forgive Vidar because he attempted to save his life during the battle.

As they are lying there upon the field, the Emperor and his army are seen to march past and on into the distance. And here we must leave these two loyal officers, who, inspired by the sight of "The Little Corporal," their beloved leader, are content to forget their wounds and spend their last expiring breath in shouting "Long live the Emperor!"

Chicago, Ill.—A contract has been let for the erection of a new theatre on Sixty-third street for the Imperial Theatre Co. to cost about $250,000. It will be located on Lexington and Woodlawn avenues.

By ERNST LUZ

Until some method is adopted by the manufacturers of pictures whereby the musician is informed of what he is expected to play, better picture playing will to a certain extent demand more of the musician than any other occupation connected, not only with the projection, but the production of the picture play as well, for after we have a repertoire, we need to memorize the greater part and having done this, which in many instances is no easy task, we necessarily must be of a very flexible temperament and allow ourselves to be musically inspired by the picture we are playing. After all this we have yet to cultivate an originality, for while the rules governing the working out of dramatic situations or action are more or less fixed, it is necessary that the melodious setting be such as not to become tiresome to your hearers, which can only be done by changing your descriptive or toning numbers at a point in the picture where your male character predominance changes to the female or where a new line of action opens.

Who then is in a better position to know these points in the picture than the manufacturer, and why should he not take the first step to remove the stigma of degrading music from the picture theatre. They sometimes (very seldom) have an inspiration in support of which I have placed a plot in this issue of Lubin Release "The Heavenly Voice."

In this picture they have gone so far as to place a musical cue on two leaders, viz.: "Believe Me If All Those Endearing Young Charms" and "Oh! Promise Me."

They were really prompts, not cues, for the action requiring these numbers, which in fact were very appropriate, did not occur until 20 to 40 feet after the leaders, and I wonder did they care as to what was played for the rest of the picture, for the action requiring the mentioned numbers was of very little length. My plot will readily show there is no heavy action, the picture being of quiet temperament and all scenes of a soft toned effect. When the leader "A Musical Blacksmith" was shown, I was all prepared to do an anvil chorus stunt, and imagine my surprise when the blacksmith was handed a banjo and my worry to make new calculations quickly. I mention a 2-4 topical song, it being usual for banjo accompaniment and I seemed to be right, for the loungers were beating my tempo. I do not profess to know that I was right, but I do know that the Lubin Co. could give the right tempo or number, did they so desire. As a fit punishment for the producers' musical neglect I would sentence them to arouse their ambition and play pictures for four consecutive hours each day (some play double this time), with the privilege of my giving deserved criticism, for I know that after realizing the ignoble position they were in, they would give some relief in the way of a guide, based on theatrical orchestra rules which I know to be sufficient. It is a fact that musicians of my acquaintance whom I know to be competent, are unsuccessful with the pictures. Some lack originality, others inspiration, and many the necessary qualifications to separate a picture story into what might be called its musical parts. Why should the picture demand all this of a musician? Is it not enough that he should have made use of his intelligence in the study of music? All these present requirements would be unnecessary were a cue system adopted, and not alone the advanecd musician, but anyone having mastered a suitable repertoire of music, could give satisfaction in picture playing. Adapting yourself to catching cues is child's play when compared to the present requirements.

The picture music will never improve until music is used in the musical portrayal of a picture, regardless of the fact that many ambitious players try to make themselves believe that picture playing requires a non-music method and advance theories as to how to accomplish this.

Improved picture music is not far off and I would advise picture musicians who have allowed themselves to forget or neglect their music, to look it up and collect a suitable repertoire, for when it comes there will be excellent openings for the musician that is ready. With the influx of high-class features, giving excellent musical opportunitics and their projection to suitable musical programs, will have an immediate tendency to entirely change the musical conditions now existing in the picture theatre, for there are many exhibitors who are anxiously awaiting the solution of the picture music problem. It has long been agitated to do away with the cheap vaudeville in the picture theatre, but on account of it being featured in many theatres it remains. When picture music has been brought to a practical method it will far surpass vaudeville as a feature and the vaudeville problem will then also be solved.

To the producer I would say, "Send us some relief," and to the player "Be ready and do not neglect your repertoire."

OUR QUESTION BOX

By R. J. Kay

Mr. Kay:

Why must a Standard or Simplex machine be grounded in an asbestos bath? S. L.

To S. L.:

These machines must be grounded for protection of the line and makes it easier to locate troubles.

* * * *

L. K. writes to the Question Box. I have a 16-inch fan in my booth. It was out of order lately. I had the armature rewound and now it will only run on half speed when the lever is on top notch. Can you tell me the trouble? My current is D. C.

Answer to L. K.:

Your trouble is a very simple one. If you will test out your commutator you will find it is short circuited and the armature has no chance to magnetize.

* * * *

Mr. Kay:

I have a Powers No. 5 machine using direct current. Yesterday my fuse blew while I was running a picture. I opened the lamp house to find the trouble and when I touched the lamp I got a shock in spite of the fact that the fuse was blown. "Why should this happen?" H. BECK.

To H. Beck:

If you will keep up to the rules of the department of electricity you would test out your lamp before every performance, and you would not have this trouble. Your neutral fuse was blown but left your live wire fuse O. K. This gave you current from a ground in your lamp.

MUSICAL PLOTS

By Ernst Luz.

A few rules governing their use.

The cues given will allow for natural ending of strains, unless "Leader" cue, in which case a quick segue should be made unless otherwise stated. Avoid Overtures and Potpourris in their entirety; each picture creates its own selection or potpourri. The cues are so stated as to give you both a prompt and direct cue. You are safe in making segue as soon as you are positive of your prompt cue. Avoid introductions to numbers unless otherwise stated. Avoid the shading of numbers as printed, an even mezzo forte being the best. From this you can get both pp and ff shadings with effect according to the demands of picture action. When shading is positively essential you will find words "Tone to action." Avoid the use of books. They are not practical for setting-up. In playing numbers following a certain line of action drop to pp in case there is a cut-in of flash scenes. For playing recopy plots legibly on large paper and fasten by clasp to right of music stand or piano. Read the Film Stories in this magazine as it will familiarize you with the cues. Studio projection would allow for material improvement in set-ups. We are always ready to bear from you and explain any difficulties you may have with these plots or otherwise. If personal reply is requested enclose stamped envelope.

NOTES OF THE WEEK

One of the special features of the Mental Hygiene Conference held at the College of the City of New York from Novemher 8 to November 15, was an exhibit prepared by experts in mental diseases under the direction of Dr. Stewart Paton, of Princeton. This included maps, charts and statistics illustrating the extent of insanity in the United States, its nature, causes and means for its prevention.

There were also moving pictures showing the methods of examination and treatment of patients followed in various State hospitals.

According to the Oakland, Cal., Tribune prediction that the moving picture machine and the stereopticon lantern will eventually replace the text hook in the school room is made hy Professor C. W. Childs, who is now filling the important rôle of lecturer in the public schools of Oakland.

Careful study of results has convinced Professor Childs and other local educators that the moving picture machine and the stereopticon lantern afford unlimited possihilities, and a plan is now under way to increase the use of these features throughout the department.

Professors Burkhalter and Inskeep were the first persons to use the stereopticon in school work in Oakland, establishing this feature years ago at the manual training and commercal high school.

Professor C. W. Childs, who has had considerable experience as a lecturer for the United States Government and at the land show at Chicago, is now lecturing in Oakland class rooms with lantern slides on physical and commercial geography and history.

Oakland is the first city on the Pacific Coast to use the stereopticon in grammar school work. Teachers and pupils will he taught to manipulate the lanterns so that they can illustrate their lessons whenever they desire.

In order to provide the limit of realism in moving pictures, a group of actors—men, women and children—actually faced a dozen lions and tigers in an amphitheatre in Rome recently. The amphitheatre was erected to provide as near as possible a reproduction of the devouring of the Christians hy wild beasts during the time of Nero. The actors were placed in the arena and the animals were turned loose. Trainers drove off the heasts hefore they were near enough to the actors to do them harm. The expressions of terror on the faces of the children are obviously genuine.

The following is not only amusing but true:

"I am an habitual attendant of the moving picture houses," says a well-known Columhus merchant. "Every time possihle at my lunch hour, and if not then just before I go home in the evening, I drop into these places, which give one so much of entertainment and instruction for their modest admission price.

"One of the most striking things I have picked up in my nickelodeon ramhlings is the moving picture face. It is a sensitive thing, ever responsive to what is going on in the screen hefore it.

"Not long since I was watching a clown picture in which the lead was taken hy a comedian of great ability with an ahnormal capacity for funny faces. I happened to take my eyes from the screen and look at a fellow sitting beside me, when lo! his face was moving in response to every contortion in the face of the actor. Again I have seen a tragic piece and noticed some much-affected young woman swaying hither and yon, obeying every movement of the sorrowing heroine.

"One thing surely can be said of the movies—they absorb the attention of the people who see them even more completely than the speaking dramas of the ordinary theatre. The pictures, whatever they are, get right to the people's hearts."

According to Clark E. Locke, in the Toronto News, there are 273 moving picture theatoriums in commission in Ontario to-day, and each of them enjoys a large and well-estahlished patronage. No innovation in public entertainment within the last decade has seized so firmly the public fancy and none other has appeared so broad in appeal as to fascinate equally both old and young. Indeed so rapidly has this form of diversion attained popularity that to-day appreciation of it is almost universal. Scarcely a town or village to which a whisper of the dramatic world ever penetrates but boasts its little dark room, town hall auditorium, or metamorphosed storeroom where weekly crowds assemble to hear the buzz of the reels and watch the films click by.

The New York Times' correspondent makes the following interesting statement with reference to amusement conditions in Turkey during the Turkish-Balkan War:

On my return to Pera I was struck by the extraordinary calmness and indiffcrence of the population. As on any other Sunday, a veritable multitude of promenaders moved slowly along the streets, making the circulation of carriages difficult. Women and children came out in hundreds from the cinematographs and the confectioners' shops and the cafes were full. Reassured hy the presence of the foreign cruisers, nobody thought of anything except amusement.

EXHIBITORS' NOTES.

An expenditure of $90,000 for the huilding of an exclusively moving picture theatre announced recently hy William C. Bettis of the Colonial Theatre, Summit and Jackson streets, marks the heginning of the development of a new era in the picture play industry, in so far as Toledo is concerned.

It is asserted that the new play house, to he located on Summit street, near Madison, will be the largest exclusively moving picture theatre between New York and Chicago. Work will be hegun on it next April,

For the second time since July 1 the Dr. Stillman property, 517-521 South Salina street, Syracuse, changed hands recently. Incidentally it was declared that it was the seventeenth important real estate transaction involving that hlock to take place in about four months. The purchaser this time was Dr. Silas Hubhell, who paid $60,000 for the property, on which he intends to erect a moving picture theatre.

The lot has a frontage of 40 feet on Salina street and is 110 feet in depth. It is 69 feet south of the only five corners in the commercial section, if not in the whole city, formed by the intersection of Salina and Onondaga streets and the head of Harrison street.

The property is directly across Salina street from the Florence building. It is understood that the purchaser will begin the erection of a theatre probably in May.

WARNER OLAND

Appearing in the Hochstetter Utility Company's Production of "The Life of John Bunyan" and "Pilgrim's Progress"

By M. I. MacDONALD

It is only of recent date that men and women foremost in the drama have lent their personalities and talents, or even their thoughts, to the elevating of the art of motion picture making—such artists as Sarah Bernhardt, Rejane, in Europe, and in our own country Blanche Walsh, Nat C. Goodwin, James O'Neil, Warner Oland, Clifford Leigh, and many others of equal fame in the drama.

Warner Oland, one of the most interesting and most talented of those artists whom we designate as American, is of Scandinavian birth, being born in the north of Sweden in 1879. Mr. Oland came to this country when about the age of thirteen, therefore receiving a good portion of his education on American soil.

Warner Oland's personality is characterized by that dignity of manner common to those of Scandinavian birth. There is about him an artistic dash, and an atmosphere of mastery and accomplishment that sets him far apart from the common herd of would-be's—he is neither a would-be nor a has-been, he is a substantiation of the greatest on the interpretative side of the dramatic art.

Like the majority of the few individuals in this world who believe and realize that Truth and her ally Beauty are together the foundation of all things worth while, Warner Oland is simple and unassuming in manner.

Another impression which I received in a short interview with Mr. Oland was that he is endowed with more common sense consistence than usually is found in the make-up of an artist. Fourteen years ago he made his initial bow to the public in the star role of "The Christian," making a tremendous impression in the part. Later on he appeared with Viola Allen in her Shakespearian repertoire, and afterward with Sothern and Marlowe. And more recently still Mr. Oland added laurels to his already enviable name in the dramatic world, by his wonderful portrayal of "The Father," a work written by a countryman of his own, Sweden's greatest author, August Strinberg. He has shown his good sense as well as his devotion to his art in associating himself with only the best people in his profession regardless of pecuniary advantages.

"Every time I have made a little extra bunch of money," said Mr. Oland, "I have invested it in the production of something, just to help the cause along."

"I have found," he continued, "that although there are a great many shouting about the uplift of the drama, very few are willing to spend a cent to better conditions."

Mr. Oland also denounces the "Star" system, which, he declares, has in the past been an enemy to dramatic creation so far as the writer is concerned.

Also, he states with the truth of his conviction, that the recipes given by some managers to young authors to take home and write a play by, is destroying the originality of these youthful writers.

It is only within the past month or so that we have known Warner Oland through the medium of the motion picture, when he appeared to such splendid advantage in the Hochstetter Utility Company's production of "The Life of John Bunyan," and "Pilgrim's Progress."

Mr. Oland expresses himself as being intensely interested in the motion picture as a work of art. Said he, "There are wonderful avenues to which the motion picture will evolve which have not yet been thought of. Up to date, with a few exceptions, too little thought has been expended on the arrangement and composition of the pictures. For instance, a mob scene presented in a moving picture, must of reason have more care given to detail than that presented on the legitimate stage—it must be more than a mere coming on and going off—it must of necessity have some semblance of system in arrangem and pantomimic expression in order to present an artistic picture."

Continuing his remarks he said: "There is every chance for a clever artist to get an idea over in the motion picture. In the way of facial or bodily expression, nothing is lost before the camera."

A more interesting, affable and intelligent man could scarcely be found than Warner Oland. And it was indeed a privilege as well as a pleasure to be granted an interview with him.

A NEW ACQUISITION TO THE ARTISTIC STAFF OF THE ECLAIR

The Eclair Film Company has been most fortunate in securing the services of the well-known French artist, Mons. Benjamin Carre, a student of the celebrated painter, Adelur.

Mons. Carre hails from the Studio Amable, where the principal scenes for the Grand Opera and Comedie François, of Paris, and the Century Theatre, of New York, were devised and executed. He has also been the designer and artist in all the large cinematograph studios of Paris, arranging such productions as "Robert le Diable," "Christian Martyrs," "The Huguenots," "Death of Mozart," "Chopin," "Thais" and "Balthasar's Feast," and his advent, therefore, means a valuable acquisition to the already extensive production department of the Eclair and will thus enable the company to present even greater and more finished productions than have heretofore been put out.

Mons. Carre arrived last Saturday, the 9th inst., accompanied by Mons. Ettiene Arnaud, the Eclair principal and head director, who has just returned from a brief visit to Paris.

It may be remembered that Mons. Arnaud is responsible for the "Holy City," "Robin Hood," and the other notable Eclair productions, and now promises even greater things for the future.

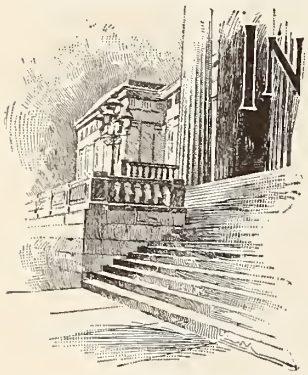
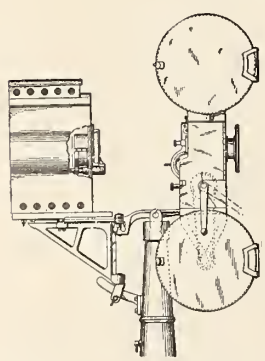
INNOVATIVE

Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Especially for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City



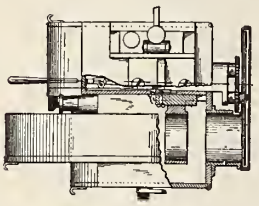
IN the Patent Office the present course of appeals imposes on applicants an unnecessary amount of delay and expense. The purpose of the patent system is to place inventions at the service of the public at as early a date as practicable, and unnecessary delays affect not only applicants but all interested in the industries to which the inventions relate. Hence, one appeal within the office, together with the appeal to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, would seem to be ample, especially in view of the fact that in a suit on a patent a single appeal takes the case from the trial court to the Court of Appeals. Under the present statutes patent appeals in ex parte cases lie from the Primary Examiners to the Board of Examiners-in-Chief, thence to the Commissioner, and from his decision to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia. In interference cases the course of appeals is the same, there being three possible appeals in either case. The Commissioner proposes to remedy this by an amendatory act of Congress constituting the Commissioner, First Assistant Commissioner, Assistant Commissioner and Examiners-in-Chief a single appellate tribunal, any three of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which all Office appeals shall lie, and from which appeals may be taken direct to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia.

"PEOPLE VERSUS DOLLAR" is the title of an action at law cited in 26 Pacific Reporter, p. 1086. "People pro Dollar" would sound more reasonable, but to be "up against it" either as a whole people or as a component part thereof—what's the use—only one inevitable result—unless?—but why anticipate. Still, "Hope springs eternal," etc.



Patent No. 1,041,345, issued to Edwin S. Porter, assignor of one-half interest to Francis B. Connock, both of New York City, relates to Kinetoscopes, and is designed to provide improved means for projecting a series of photographs on a film upon a suitable screen; to provide means for accurately "framing" the said photographs as they are successively projected, without the necessity for moving any of the operative parts of the projector out of their normal positions—said "framing" being accomplished by a rotary adjustment, of an intermittent film-carrying sprocket; to provide a shutter for closing off the light at the aperture of the projector during the intermittent movement of the film, and also to provide means whereby the shutter may be adjusted, with respect to the moment of aperture closure, simultaneously with and in the degree of the adjustment of said intermittent sprocket; to provide means for adjusting the shutter independently of said intermittent sprocket, in order to obviate the lines, shadows, or "ghost" effect, on the screen due to lack of coincidental film and shutter operation; to so locate the manual devices for adjusting the feeding sprocket, shutter, lenses, and stereopticon, when employed, as to be readily reached by the free hand of an operator not employed in turning the crank of the projector; to completely inclose the operative parts of the projector, as well as the film, whereby no injury can result thereto, and whereby the film, if ignited, is quickly quenched and without any notice of such ignition exteriorly of the projector, thus preventing panic among the audience as well as the spread of fire from the film; to provide a fire-door for the projector which automatically closes to protect the film in the event of too slow operation, or stopping, of the projector; to so construct the projector as to permit of passing the film thereinto at any point intermediate of the ends of said film, as well as the removal thereof from the projector at any time; to provide a film trap-door which is quickly and easily moved out and into operative positions, and which is readily removable from the projector for cleansing and repair; to provide a sectional cell for the condensers in the lamp-box, whereby the distance between the condensers may be readily adjusted to meet varying conditions or to compensate for varying thicknesses of the said condensers, and whereby the condensers may be readily removed for replacement or cleansing at any time; to so mount the condensers as to permit expansion or contraction thereof without fear of breakage; to provide projectors which are practical, well adapted to the purpose for which they are designed, which permit of entire manipulation from one point during the operation thereof, and which are practically noiseless in operation; all of which provisions and others are exemplified in nine sheets of drawing and over 800 folios of specification and claims.

REDFORD, formerly Examiner of Plays, has been appointed to the new and important office of CENSOR FOR FILMS for Great Britain—a critical situation, and possibly an odoriferous one. "Then, methought, the air grew denser, perfumed (?) from an unseen censer."



Patent No. 1,041,346, issued to Edwin S. Porter, assignor of one-half to Francis B. Cannock, both of New York City, relates to Kinetoscopes, being a subdivision of the application upon which the preceding Patent No. 1,041,345 was founded. The objects are to provide means exterior of the kinetoscope, for adjusting the lens thereof to attain a proper focus; to so locate the exterior operating means as to be convenient to the operator during the operation; to accomplish this adjustment through the medium of a rack and pinion movement; and to so arrange the operative parts as to be clear of the kinetoscope mechanism.

The device comprises in conjunction with a kinetoscope having the usual lens and lens cell, a partition provided with an opening, a lens-cell carrier slidable in guides on one side of said partition, a rack slidable in suitable guides on the other side of said partition, means for connecting said carrier and rack, and means, exterior of said kinetoscope, for moving said rack and carrier to adjust said lens.

Frederick Persky, of New York City, has applied for the registration of "TRIPLEX," as a trade-mark for lantern lenses. Claims used since April 1, 1912.

"THE SCENAGRAPH" is a London innovation, a traversy involving a moving picture illusion with a wonderful transformation scene. It is to be reproduced in this country, presumably by Joe Weber, who has the offer to stage this foreign piece on behalf of Walter Hast, who has the American direction of it. In this connection it may be noted that the London "Cinema" halls are making good, and that Cockneys pay all the way from a "bob" to half a "quid" to satisfy their craving for the movies, thus averaging more than double the rates in vogue here.

Patent No. 1,041,784, issued to Ward B. Hausman, of Philadelphia, Pa., relates to moving picture apparatus which may be used for taking the pictures, printing them, and projecting them upon a screen. The object is to provide a simple, compact, inexpensive but effective device for the purposes designated, and the inventor claims, in combination with a moving picture machine, a main shaft, vertical rods mounted in suitable bearings, frame members, having grooves therein secured to said vertical rods, a cam plate having a squared central opening slidably mounted in said grooves, a cam mounted on the main shaft adapted to operate against the side walls of the opening in the cam plate for moving said cam plate horizontally and the frame members vertically, an arm mounted on the cam plate and extending at right angles thereto, pins adjustably mounted on said arm, screws for holding said pins in their adjustment, and other specific details of construction set forth in the specification, and shown in numerous drawings.

Among the new film incorporations is the International Film Company, New York City.

Among the incorporators are Joseph Klau and W. B. Gray of the Comet Film Company. The purpose of the company is to maintain a general theatrical and motion picture business.

The Chinese Government has under consideration a communication from the Chinese Chamber of Commerce in Shanghai requesting the promulgation of a uniform system of registration of trade-marks. Although the commercial treaty between the United States and China of 1903 contemplated protection of trade-marks, patents and copyrights, to citizens and subjects of those countries, no patent laws have as yet been enacted and no Patent Office has as yet been established in China. Provisional registration bureaus for trade-marks have been opened at the Shanghai and Tientsin offices of the Chinese maritime customs where owners of such rights, either personally or by their agents, are invited to register through their consuls, and patents and copyrights are also received for registration. A registration is first effected in the consulate of the country of the applicant and is then sent on to the Commissioner of Customs for registration in the provisional bureau. The result is merely a provisional registration giving tangible evidence of priority of claims of ownership to be considered when trade-mark, patent, and copyright laws come into effect in China and application is made for actual registration.

We shall be pleased to answer pertinent questions propounded by readers of the Moving Picture News.

HOW NEW YORK TRAVELS

The success with which New Yorkers get on in life, and incidentally their daily traffic, showing how the spirit moves and also the body, is depicted in the Gaumont film "How New York Travels," to be released on the Saturday Great Events split reel date of November 30th. Here is shown how six million people travel daily and the system of transportation which conveys the population of the second largest city of the world from the wildest wilds of Brooklyn to the darkest Bronx, from the regal wilderness of Kings to the serried streets of Manhattan. All kinds of trolley cars are shown, pay (pray) as you enter, in which you deposit your nickel before you actually get a seat or the privilege of hanging on a strap; the common or Mary Garden variety in which you slink into a seat with the fugitive hope, as you cower behind a newspaper, that the conductor will not ask for your fare; the double-decker trolley from which you can look on the common people from the height of twelve feet more or less, and the low (two) step trolley (everybody's doing it).

There are also pictures of the subway car which travels to and fro in the largest hole in the world, and the elevated, which in spite of its continuous height, cannot seem to elevate the dividends of its company. Also the Fifth avenue bus, where you pay ten cents for the privilege of riding a rocky road to Dublin for which the asphalt on Fifth avenue is justly famed. People have become seasick on the Fifth avenue bus and have tried to lean against the mast and faintly call upon the captain to stop the ship.

There are views of the Brooklyn Bridge strawberry jam of which thousands of commuters get a large taste every evening. Anybody who knows Brooklyn will always wonder why they seem in such a hurry to go there.

Last but not least is the electric patrol wagon in which you pay no fare immediately, although it is included in your fine in court later. Here you travel with the greatest eclat, surrounded by clubs, uniforms, brass buttons and policemen who scorn to take a bribe.

This is a lively film and is a sermon to every young man who wants to keep moving, and particularly in New York.

CHICAGO DEPARTMENT

By Oscar J. Hazel

The Clifton Theatre, at 1136 Wilson avenue, and the Edgewater Theatre, at 1130 Bryn Mawr avenue, two of Chicago's classy ten-cent picture play houses, are owned and operated by Mr. and Mrs. R. L. Crescy, each a credit to the profession. The lady insists on doing the booking for the two houses, and the number of automobiles nightly lined up in front of both places is a fitting tribute to her artistic eye in choosing the films to be displayed. Mr. Crescy, in introducing us said, "She is my wife, my business manager, and my chum," and she added soto voce, "and boss." They are indeed a happy pair, and are meeting with deserved success.

Remarking on the beautiful clearness of the pictures on his curtain, I asked Mr. Crescy if for the benefit of other Chicago exhibitors he would let The Moving Picture News in on its composition, he kindly remarked, "Sure thing. Just tell the boys who are fortunate enough to take the News that I made my curtain out of the usual curtain muslin and then gave it a couple of coats of whiting and water, about like whitewash, spread on evenly. It suits me, and my patrons are delighted with my pictures. Of course a good operator and machine cut a figure in the final result." The "composition" is not patented.

Several weeks ago Mr. V. R. Day, the genial, hustling general manager of the Essanay Film Mfg. Co., while passing by a busy scrubwoman, stepped on the wet floor in such a manner that he slipped and fell, fracturing his right limb above the knee. He was hurriedly removed to a private hospital, where the injured member was attended to. He heroically endured the resultant excruciating pain and confinement in bed a sufficient length of time, according to his naturally active and business-laden brain, when without consulting his surgeon, he secured a crutch and went down to his private office in the First National Bank building. "The confinement and inaction," said Mr. Day, after we had passed the compliments of the meeting, "was a darn sight worse than the broken limb, it seemed like; so I just simply hiked. And you can't imagine the relief and comfort I experienced when I planted myself once again in my familiar office chair." And his face denoted the pleasure he felt. Mr. Day is one of Chicago's busiest managers in the moving picture industry, and simply is delighted when he is "swamped with orders." He is never too busy, though, to have a pleasant word for a visitor, on business bent or otherwise. Hence his success and popularity. As I went out I heard him softly whistling, "There was an old soldier and he had a wooden leg."

Here is a funny proposition, and absolutely unfathomable to me. In my rounds among the different exhibitors throughout the city I frequently ran across a manager or owner of a theatre who will refer to some one in the same business in the most scurrilous and abusive manner, as though the party were a personal enemy, simply because the other fellow happens to be using a different brand of film in his show. Why it is more strange to me is that sometimes the two parties are miles apart, and maybe don't meet for months at a time. This spirit is not good, from any standpoint, either for business, sociability or the upbuilding of the profession in Chicago, and should cease. What is it of my business if you use a different brand of film from the one I use? If you know that my films are inferior to the ones you display, you should be glad it is so, for the public will go where the best is secured for its money, no matter who the proprietor or manager may be. This is doubly true where the playhouses are close together; but when they are far apart, what in the world can prompt the enmity? Some Chicago exhibitor, please explain.

Some well-wisher of the patient, toiling Knight of the Crank some time ago introduced into his booth and applied to his machine a dainty little motor, that his physical exertion might be thereby greatly lessened and the volume of perspiration from his tired body be appreciably decreased. For a time it seemed to be indeed a blessing, and was heralded with pleasure throughout the land. I could never understand why it so suddenly lost favor with both the managers and operators. Now I am "on."

The other day I was forced to hear one of those dialogues which are meant for only two, but which I couldn't avoid hearing unless I ran away; but after hearing a few words, I really wanted to hear the rest, it was so interesting. A crowd of young fellows were playing pool and a few others were looking on enjoying the repartee and sharp jabs of wit being exchanged by the happy players and friends as I sauntered over to also enjoy the fun, as a stranger.

"Hello, Moving Picture News," yelled one of the boys, as he came over and shook hands. Then they all spoke to me. I at once recognized them as a few of the machine operators, possibly out on a little lark. The game finished, we adjourned to a couple of tables and sat down for some stories, and those crank boys can surely tell some good ones. One I will repeat, on account of both its devilish mean defiance and also levity. After two or three had spun laughable yarns, more or less personal to themselves, Mat Baldwin said to Alex McHugh:

"Say, Alex, now that it is all over and the thing has all been cut out, tell us how in the dickens that fire ever started in your booth out at the White City that time?

Alex hesitated, saying something about putting it "mild-like in the paper," looking at me. I promised to let him down easy, so he turned squarely around facing Mat, and said, with that peculiar half humorous, half-guilty chuckle:

"You son-of-a-gun rubber neck, you have asked me that same question a hundred times before, and I have heretofore been a bit leary of giving up; but now I am going to tell the whole truth and nothing but the truth, et cetera.'

"Well," he began, "I had been running the motor on my machine for two or three weeks, and was sure stuck on it. It was a blamed little dandy, had three or four speeds, and worked to perfection. On the night of the little illumination in question, just before going up into the booth, who should walk in and joyfully grab my hand but Abey Cavanaugh. You know Abey was a crackerjack operator. I had been out all night to a dance the night before, and felt like h——, and was real glad to see him. I made a dicker with him to go up and run her a while for me until I could properly get my bearings.' I explained all about the motor, and he said, 'I gutcha.' So I left him in charge and went over to the poolroom and went to sleep in a chair. You can bet I was wide awake in a jiffy. I went over close enough to make sure it was our joint, and then I beat it for the elevated. Next day I scoured the town until I found that little Jew-Irishman, and had just opened my mouth to commence my verbal introduction to the sound lickin' I had in store for him, when he beat me to it by blurting out:

"That's a blankety blank fine motor you've got; no sense a little bit. I just started the reel going nice, and saw that everything was dandy, and went across the street to play a game of pool. I wouldn't trust one of the damn things an inch."

"What could I do with a fool like that, especially when he looked so disgusted?" moaned Alex, with an imitation tear on one cheek.

At this everybody roared, and I called the waiter. So that's the incipiency of the death of the motor in driving motion picture machines, at least in Chicago.

The last words as we were parting company were from Mat to Alex, who said, in his most impressive manner:

"God loveth a cheerful liar!"

"A Curable Disease" is the title of a film recently released by the Edison Company, and is certainly one of the best inspirations of that great film house, ever on the lookout for brilliant and educating subjects to portray to the American public.

Typographical Union No. 16 has secured this reel to display to its membership on next Saturday evening, the 30th inst., and it is safe to say every member who can will attend. As the story of the play hinges around an afflicted member of the New York Union, cursed with that human destroyer, consumption, who was thoroughly cured, happily married and back to work again, bigger and stronger than ever, it should prove a drawing card with all classes of people wherever shown. I give a paragraph from a letter from Mr. Thomas Edison to the vice-president of No. 16 in Chicago, Mr. John M. McGowan.

in answer to a communication on the subject. Mr. Edison says:

"This strong dramatic story deals with the White Plague, showing the conditions that arise in the life of a young linotyper who contracts tuberculosis while working on a New York daily. We are shown his deep love for a young girl and eventually his engagement and preparations for marriage. All goes merry as a wedding bell until within a few days of his wedding, when he hears from the doctor that he has become a victim of this dread disease. In a moment all his bright plans for the future are torn from him and with the solemn words of his medical adviser in his ears, "You have no right to marry until you are cured," he staggers blindly to the home of his fiancee and there is enacted that pitiful scene where two young lives stand upon the brink of separation, forced apart by the cruel hands of the disease. Fond eyes look into fond eyes for the last time perhaps, dear hands clasp dear hands, and the victim goes pathetically to his little hall bedroom to face the black future with only one gleam of hope—the Union Printers' Home, Colorado Springs."

Aye, Mr. Edison, thousands of eyes of honest Union printers throughout America and Canada turn lovingly toward that famed "one gleam of hope," and deep down in as many throbbing, thankful hearts there is an ever-present wealth of love for the one grand old philanthropist, now gone to his reward, who made it possible for this "one gleam of hope" to bless the soil of America—the late lamented and beloved George W. Childs, of Philadelphia. You and your gifted company have builded wiser than you knew in giving the world a chance to see that this heretofore seemingly incurable scourge of the human race is fast losing its awful terrors, and that it can be cured. Mr. Edison, the Chicago Department of The Moving Picture News tenders to you its personal thanks for your heroic action in this matter, as does the seventy thousand other members of the International Typographical Union, and as will also, eventually, the millions of earth's civilization. Good luck to you.

Operators' Local No. 2 has appointed a regular correspondent for the News, who will furnish notes of everything he sees and hears of interest to the general craft. For all of which we return thanks.

The Wiley Theatre, 2153 Lincoln avenue, which opens its doors to the public Thanksgiving Day, is a handsome new 300-seat playhouse, absolutely fireproof, and beautifully finished inside and out. It has steel walls and ceiling and concrete floor, the operator's booth being exceptionally spacious, and also being constructed entirely of concrete. This is the second theatre in the same block owned by this company.

* * * *

But here is the "captain corker" of them all, from my viewpoint: An amusement writer in the Chicago Evening American dishes up a "scoop" in this fashion:

"Alfred Hamburger . . . has engineered a brilliant move with the General Film Company for an exclusive first-run moving picture franchise, giving his Langley Hippodrome and Drexel Theatre, both on Sixty-third street, the initial showing on the release of the company. The franchise gives him this privilege over a territory of five miles (naming the boundaries).

"Any other exhibitors of motion pictures in this territorial rectangle will hereafter have to be satisfied with the films of the General Film Company after the two Hamburger theatres in the boundary lines have displayed them," etc., etc., says the Evening American writer.

To all of which I would respectfully, yet timidly, fearfully, ask: "Suppose the thousands of worthy picture show patrons in this disenfranchised rectangle five miles square should go to their usually patronized show places and demand of the proprietors that they get a first-run reel at least once a week! What would the poor proprietors or managers do? Of course they couldn't get a first-run picture from the General Film Company, just now, if C Sharp is correct in his language. That's a cinch. Then what?

There are many true American citizens in that blacklisted five-mile strip who, in unison with the principle of our country, will gladly take the part of the "under dog" in this fight, as they have often done before. The General Film Company, it would seem to me, is having plenty of strenuosity just now with the United States Government in defending itself against "restraint of trade" indictments, and I am surprised to note this next-of-kin deal. Hamburger is not to blame, but the film company is, in thus throwing defiance and contempt in the teeth of the discredited five miles of Chicago, solely for filthy lucre.

COMEDY FILMS

"What do my audiences want to see?" That is the question which every motion picture exhibitor asks himself when he is making up his programs, if he attacks the problem in an intelligent manner.

The chief question is whether an audience wants to see a program made up entirely of dramatic pictures, or whether they want a program in which a few comics are interspersed among the other offerings. It ought not to take a minute to reach the conclusion that the average moving picture audience wants to see the comics as much, if not more, than the heavier subjects with the mental effort which they involve.

Take, for instance, the public taste in newspapers. The greatest circulation-builder ever devised is the comic supplement. The man who aims to be superior can very easily say that the pictures in the comic supplement are nothing but nonsense and that they are ridiculous and improbable, but that does not detract from their value. It is in that that their value lies. The children and grown-ups prepare to smile when they open the comic section, and the more improbable the antics shown are the more they are enjoyed.

So it is with motion pictures, and it is in the realization of this fact that the Itala Company releases a split reel comedy offering every Monday. "A Spider in the Brain," December 2, is a good example. A spider crawls into a man's brain via the ear and the poor fellow thinks he has to catch flies until the X-ray relieves him of his dementia. On the other half of this reel is "Too Much Beauty," in which a pretty servant girl breaks up the quiet of a peaceful household. Then there is "Peeping Tom," December 9, on the same reel with "Keeping in Style," in which a man buys a hat so big that the wind sweeps him and two girls on a journey through the clouds.

No, there is no plot in any one of these films. There is no attempt to appeal to anything but the spectator's sense of fun.

The average exhibitor has trained himself not to be amused by pictures. He thinks it beneath his dignity to laugh at the antics of a comedian. But the spectator does not, and the film which makes him laugh is the film he enjoys and the one which makes him come back for more.

The spectator likes a film just because it is ludicrous, just because there is "no sense to the durn thing," and just because it gives him a chance to enjoy himself without any brain fag. Some spectators would like a program of comics alone. The average man would not. But the average man does want a comic or two mixed in with the rest of the films to give a light comedy touch to the show, and the exhibitor who realizes this and gives his audiences a little of the comedy during the evening is the one who will pack his house.—(Contributed.)

DICK'S WIFE.—What would you do if on returning from a six months' trip abroad you discovered that in order to save a fortune you had to be married within three days? Look up some of your old sweethearts and try to get one of them to marry you, wouldn't you?

Well, that is just what Dick Graham did in the Eclair picture called "Dick's Wife," hut, unfortunately, he found that all his old sweethearts were married and their hushands ohjected to heing shoved to one side.

As a last resort, he advertised, and, as luck would have it, his "ad" was read by pretty Grace Lenox, whose mother was very ill; in fact, so ill that the doctor had said that only a change of climate would save her life.

Dick's "ad" offered five hundred dollars to any young lady who would marry him, with the further stipulation that they separate immediately after the ceremony.

Grace answered this "ad" under the name of Mary Smith, and in due time the marriage took place. Grace got the five hundred dollars, was enabled to take her mother away, and Dick saved his fortune.

At their wedding, however, Grace wore a heavy veil, and Dick had a six months' growth of hair on his face, so that when they met some time afterward they failed to recognize each other, and it was not until they had fallen in love and were in despair over the fact that they were married that they discovered they were married to each other.

How did they make this discovery? Why, it was very simple. The ring used at the marriage had heen Dick's mother's, and when Grace lost it Dick found it, and hy the inscription in it he understood.

Now, the fact that the Eclair's Big Four—Miss Stewart, Miss Tennant, Mr. Francis and Mr. Johnstone—play the principal roles in this delightful little story, is a further guarantee of its success.

A STUDY OF THE FLY (Dec. 8).—The last few years have aroused men of mighty ability to combat this seemingly innocent little pest. Scientific and medical researches made the horrihle discovery that the house fly is a more deadly enemy to humanity at large than all wars, fatalities and plagues other than those which the fly itself carries.

This film discovers the dangerous little insects swarming about the dead and decomposing hody of a hog which has succumhed to cholera. There it is seen feasting on foul flesh and then crawling under this carrion body to lay its eggs.

We are shown the generation of its larvæ into life and the peculiar phenomenon which it has of liquefying the decaying flesh that it may obtain its nourishment.

Under highly microscopic conditions, its dangerous physical parts, such as the hooks ahout the mouth and the respiratory cord at the other end, are clearly depicted.

Then, as maggots, which is their common term, they are shown crawling into the decayed recesses of the flesh, there to remain till they break their shell and issue forth as flies.

After all this repugnant filth, we see them fly and feast upon a cookie which a dear little child afterwards most innocently picks up and eats.

Pipe and vase come crashing at the feet of a porcelain mender, who is passing on the street. He mends the hroken articles. Mr. and Mrs. Gontran regret, however, their hasty action. The mender brings the mended pipe and vase up and hecomes a medium for reconciliation. Mr. Gontran presents his wife with the vase and Mrs. Gontran offers her hushand the pipe, and the mender has mended their shattered joys.

GAUMONT

THE DESTRUCTIVE DUELISTS (Nov. 26).—Calino, getting doughty in his young age, struts into his club and over a trifle, quarrels with a fellow member. A duel is inevitable. They arrive at the dueling grounds, armed to the hands and to the teeth with revolvers. The spirit is willing, but the aim is weak. Both duelists perforate everything in the neighborhood hut each other. Their idea of a duel is of the "catch-as-catch-can kind, and they proceed to duel all over the immediate neighhorhood. Calino, considering it advantageous to be at the head of the procession, takes the lead with the assistance of his two very good legs. In the characteristic French fashion they bungle into all sorts of places, and, like the bull in the china shop, overturn crockery, people and card tahles, tahle d'hote meals and their own reputations for courage. Calino's opponent is a good marathon racer and keeps right on after him, and no livelier game of "follow my master" was ever played. Their course takes them into the river and finally ends with both very much hattered and hruised, hut with their honors satisfied to the hilt. In jail they proceed to smile and make up.

FOUR HEARTS THAT BEAT AS TWO (Nov. 28).—Pearl, on the way home from school for a holiday, discovers that the young man in the railroad car is quite to her fancy. To their profound joy, they hoth discover that they are hound for the same station. They agree that they shall meet again and agree to it so manifestly that Pearl's man-servant is most highly shocked at the unconventionality. Pearl, like other well-regulated girls, has a father. Much to the joy of all concerned, the young man of her railroad acquaintance pops on the scene with his mother, who seems to be an inamorita of Pearl's father. The young couple quickly find that they are not alone in their billings and cooings and that their elders are conducting a little courtship of their own. Due to an unfortunate collision of the two fond couples there is a halt in the passion program of the elder couple and Pearl's father writes to Fred's mother saying that all is over hetween them because he thinks it his duty to give attention to his daughter and not go entering into double harness again. The younger generation of this conjugal quartette disbelieve in this pre-nuptial divorce idea of their parents, and, with diplomacy worthy of the foreign corps, they reunite their elders, and Pearl gallantly proposes for her bashful father. Whereupon all retire to a jeweler's shop and get a wholesale price on wedding rings.

LUBIN

THE SAMARITAN OF COOGAN'S TENEMENT (Nov. 26).—The little house so dear to Billy and his mother is lost to them through foreclosure. With a manly heart he cheers her by telling her to come with him to the city, where he will "make his fortune" and buy her another and hetter home. Their straitened circumstances force them to take quarters in a tenement section inhabited hy gangsters. During one of Billy's trips from home in search of employment, the mother hears sounds of someone falling, and, rushing into the dingy hallway, arrives just in time to see two gangsters heating up another, Red Maguire. With the assistance of a young girl of the tenements, the little mother helps the injured man to her own apartments, where she bathes the hlood from his face and bandages his wounds. The heart of the gangster is touched by the mother's kindness to him and he vows never to forget her. Returning home one evening Billy falls in with the gangsters and goes to the docks, where drinking and gamhling are indulged in. Through intimidation Billy is led to drink, and hefore he knows is helpless. Anxiety of the mother over Billy's ahsence causes "Red" Maguire to go in search of him and he arrives just as Billy is heing led away hy a policeman to jail, where he is later sentenced to thirty days' imprisonment. Not forgetting her kindness to him and wanting to spare the mother knowledge of Billy's arrest, "Red" Maguire sends her a message in Billy's name. "Got a joh for four weeks. Had to go darn quick." When Billy is released "Red" puts money in his hand saying, "Bill your mother is a good kid. She thinks you've been working. Here's your wages for the time you've heen away. Cut out the hooze and get to work." Two years find Billy and little mother back on the farm for Billy did "cut out the booze," he went to work and earned the old home back again, to say nothing of a dear little wife and hahy, all due to the great gratitude of "Red" Maguire, the samaritan of "Coogan's Tenement."

SATIN AND GINGHAM (Nov. 28).—May Prescott, daughter of wealthy parents, is somewhat of a coquette. Her brother meets a friend whom he knew at college. The friend is a clergyman. The sister is much impressed with him, and he falls in love. As his mother is out of the city, he takes advantage of their invitation and stays at their home for a short time. The favored suitor of the girl is a man of wealth; she does not love him, but thinks of his social standing. The clergyman is going to open their cottage for the return of his mother, and goes to the house, gets a woman to clean and arrange everything. He then asks May if she will go with him and see if the house is in order. She consents. When they reach the little home, they are hoth thirsty, and begin to prepare a little tea party. She has on a white dress, and fearing that she will get it soiled, Tom takes from a closet a long gingham apron and tells her to put it on. She does not like the idea much, but puts it on. The tea is served in the cozy living room, and after it is over, she tells him to unfasten the apron, calling it a badge of servitude. He is a little hurt, hut takes it off. Later she goes with him in her machine, to meet his mother, a sweet old lady, who falls in love with the girl at once. They leave May at her home, and her man drives the mother and son to the cottage. Later her engagement to the middle-aged man is announced, and at the supper that evening, she reads in the clergyman's eyes a greater promise for happiness than she sees in the wealth of the other. At the young man's home he tells his mother of his love, she is all tenderness to him, and tells him of the power of prayer, and sitting before the open fire he lays his head on the arm of her chair, and she sends a prayer for her son's happiness. At her home, the girl, attired in a lovely white satin gown, is at the tahle, the center of a merry party. Suddenly she rises from the table, pleads a headache, and leaves the room. In her own room, she takes off the engagement ring, writes a note saying that she cannot marry a man she does not love. At the home of the young man, his mother tells him to go and light the fire for tea; he does so and returns. May steals into the house, into the kitchen, sees the tea boiling, goes to the closet for the apron and puts it on. She takes the tray, and it is a very demure little person who serves the tea to the mother and son. Later the mother leaves the room; the girl standing hefore the fire in the apron makes a very lovely picture to the young man; hut he remembers her dislike for the apron, goes to her and tries to unfasten it; she shakes her head and tells him that she wants to wear it all the time. She half turns, as he takes her in his arms.

THE THIRD THANKSGIVING (Nov. 25).—In the New England farmhouse, Mrs. Hale has just finished preparations for the Thanksgiving dinner. Her husband and she are joyfully waiting for their son George to come home. He comes, but with him is a young actress, Madge. He intends to marry her. His father denounces him; Madge wants to leave but George insists; whereupon Mr. Hale drives his son from the house. The mother clears the table, puts away the things—it is a spoiled Thanksgiving.

George gets married and goes to the city. He gets a job, and he and his wife live very simply in a little flat. A boy is born to them, and George sends a picture of mother and son to his parents asking if they will not let them all come up to the farm for the next Thanksgiving. The parents do not answer this letter (though the mother hides away the picture) and each family spends the next Thanksgiving in a lonely way.

Some time afterward George is taken ill and loses his position. He and Madge are threatened by dire poverty and in this extremity Madge decides that she must go to work again. She gets some work with a motion picture company.

The first motion picture theatre is opened in the New England village, and though Hale and his wife are bitterly opposed to theatres of any kind, they are induced to go on the opening night. A film is shown with Madge taking a frivolous part in ball costume and dancing—the old couple rise and leave the theatre. At home Mrs. Hale takes out the hidden photograph and their suspicion that they have seen Madge is confirmed. They at once pack up, go to the city, make their way to their son, and denounce Madge as unfit for his wife. And then it is that they discover the kind of woman she really is.

The third Thanksgiving is shown. All gather in the New England farmhouse about the steaming feast and Mr. Hale says grace. Absently then he begins to play with the baby, and becomes so engrossed in the tot that he forgets about the dinner. The three nudge each other and smile fondly, until laughingly they recall him to the occasion; he starts with a great laugh and begins to carve the turkey.

SOME RARE SPECIMENS AND A FEW OLD FRIENDS (Nov. 26).—New York Zoological Park—Few people realize the brains, money, time and care that it takes to keep up an institution like the New York Zoological Park. It is absolutely free and all may come and study the wonders of natural history that are garnered from all corners of the globe. It is second to none in Europe or America for its variety and rarity of specimens.

In this film the endeavor has been to secure mostly those that are seldom, if ever, seen. One of the most unique specimens is the Secretary bird from South Africa. It belongs to the hawk family and lives principally on snakes, which it kills by stamping with its feet; this action is shown in the film.

The giant Galapagos Island tortoises are the only living link that connects the present with the reptilian age. A specimen is here shown that is estimated to be four hundred years old. In a zoological garden in London there is a specimen that has been there sixty or seventy years, and the growth of this one has been estimated and averaged in that time and in this way its age has been ascertained.

Among the wonders of the bird family is that emperor of the air, the condor of South America, which flies almost to the height of six miles. There is no other known animal on earth that can live in that rarefied atmosphere.

The famous gila monster, the only known poisonous lizard, is brought close to view; the Tasmanian Devil, a very savage and powerful little beast belonging to the Marsupial family, grotesque in appearance and a product of Australasia; the capybara of South America, the largest living rodent, which looks like an enormous rat, weighing about seventy-five pounds; a puma from Texas, South American tapir, musk ox from the Arctic Circle, and the great crowned pigeons from New Guinea, are all shown. All of these are most interesting to behold.

A small herd of Mongolian wild horses vie with the pygmy hippopotami from Liberia for distinction. These were secured at the enormous cost of twenty-five thousand dollars, and are the only ones ever taken alive; more, they are the only living link between the zebra and the horse, and are descendants of the ephippus. The pygmy hippopotami are the only two specimens that ever been exhibited and are recent additions to the park.

The subjects mentioned are only a few that you will see in this very interesting film. Close views have been made of them, so that an intimate knowledge will be acquired. It will prove interesting to old and young alike, for the wonders of nature enthrall both civilized and savage man alike.

STANDING ROOM ONLY (Dec. 1).—There were murmurs of indignation in a quiet little country jail because the cooking was so bad and the table service so much below that in vogue at the majority of penal institutions. The sheriff was a kind-hearted old man, and when the prisoners went to him with their sorrows he promised to rectify matters, and he did.

The old warden was dismissed in disgrace, and in his place another villager was chosen, not on account of his own abilities, but because his daughter was a most bewildering, wonderful cook, and had the reputation of never serving anything except an excellent dinner. She made an instantaneous hit in the jail, her praises were carried far and near, and the sheriff soon saw that his administration was bound to be the most popular on record. People absolutely fought for a chance to be locked up, and the sheriff's heart swelled with pride one day when the warden was compelled to hang the sign "Standing Room Only," at the front door.

The prisoners were happy and full of gratitude. One evening the attempt was made to kidnap the cook. A rural householder, desperate over his failure to land a monarch of the kitchen for intelligence offices, daringly broke into the jail, disguised as a burglar. The prisoners were on the alert, however, rescued his captive, indignantly threw him out of the jail, and locked the door.

It was a happy, happy jail for several months, and then the crash came. One morning the fair cook vanished, leaving a note in which she said that the jail was so popular she was overworked, so she had decided to marry the man she loved, and he had promised that she need cook only for him. The unsuspecting prisoners first realized something was wrong when they tackled the breakfast. It had been prepared by the horny hands of the warden, who admitted under cross examination that he and stoves had heretofore been strangers.

What could self-respecting prisoners do under the circumstances? In a few hours the jail had sunk from its proud eminence and become worse than a lunch counter. Wrathfully they went to their cells and gathered up their belongings; determinedly they marched out, never to return, and reproachfully they glared at the unhappy warden, who stood on the front steps, vainly trying to appease them. The warden watched them with anguish, as they filed out of sight, then hursting into tears he took down the "Standing Room Only" sign and tore it into bits.

He didn't need it any more.

A WILL AND A WAY (Dec. 3).—A hot-tempered old man, enraged because his daughter defied him and married the man she loved, disowned her, and made his nephew the heir to his wealth. As time passed the father frequently regretted his action, for the new heir did not improve upon acquaintance.

A couple of years after his daughter left, she returned to her father's house, hoping he would forgive and care for her. Her husband was dead and she and her hahy were in dire want. Her pitiful plea was addressed to her father, hut the nephew intercepted the letter and prepared to drive the poor woman away. Fortunately for her, the father came along at the opportune moment, affectionately greeted his daughter, and ordered the heartless nephew out of the house.

While at odds with his daughter, the old man had made a will leaving everything to his nephew. When the woman returned he made a new will, giving her all and the nephew nothing. The lawyer who drew up these documents was a tricky individual and saw a chance to henefit himself hy them. He did not destroy the old will, hut kept hoth papers. When the rich man died the lawyer got into communication with the nephew, exhihited the first will and intimated that he would suppress the second for a consideration.

The lawyer had a stenographer, a girl of strong likes and dislikes. She had met the nephew and hated him. She had seen the daughter and approved of her.

The lawyer and the nephew were dickering over their deal and the lawyer carelessly dropped the will on the desk, on the opposite side from where the nephew was sitting. The girl was summoned into the room to take some signed letters and prepare them for the mail. She saw the will, realized its importance, and while the attention of her employer was distracted, gathered it up with the letters and departed into her room.

She knew that the document must reach the proper authorities so that the rich man's daughter would not he defrauded of her rights. It was impossihle for her to slip out without attracting attention, as she would have to pass through the room in which the two men sat. There was no one to whom she could hand the letter, and yet hefore the swindlers left the office the important document was on its way to the surrogate, and when the lawyer and his client arrived in court they found that all their wicked plans had come to naught.

How did the gir circumvent them? Well, where there's a will there's a way, and she found the way that counted.

A ROMANCE OF THE U. S. N. (Dec. 6).—A foolish quarrel with his sweetheart and a desire for adventure caused a young man to enlist in the United States Navy. Soon after his departure his fiancee learned that she had treated him unjustly hut was unahle to get any trace of him. The young woman was a teacher in a school for deaf mutes, and regarded as an expert in wit of realizing t..e lips.

A year later the warships of the U. States Navy gathered in the North River, and there was a great land parade at which the girl was one of the spectators. A.. n men who marched hy her she saw with delight the man she loved. She followed him to his ship and there were mutual explanations and forgiveness.

On the day the fleet sailed the young sailor and his sweetheart lunched together in a restaurant. In the other end of the room, far from all the other guests, were three foreign-looking men. They were whispering together excitedly, and the girl watched them at first idly, and then with aroused interest. Because of her ahility to read the lip she was ahle to understand everything they said. They were discussing a plot to hlow up the ships of the fleet as they passed out to sea, and one of them explained that the mines were placed and all was in readiness to touch them off.

The girl told the facts to her sweetheart, and the two followed the conspirators to a lonely hut near the Narrows. There, while the conspirators were inside waiting, the young sailor located the wires leading to the hidden mine, dived into the water and severed them. After taking other precautions he returned to the ship, where his statement of what had happened caused him to he warmly commended.

On an eminence near the hut one of the conspirators stood watching. Suddenly he turned and ran into the building with the news that the fleet was in range of the mines. Exultantly the conspirators touched them off, then looked out of the window. To their amazement the hig warships were sailing majestically along and there were no signs of any explosion. Frantically they overhauled their apparatus, hut suddenly there was an interruption. A numher of policemen dashed into the shack and placed the cursing conspirators under arrest.

On the deck of one of the finest warships was a young sailor who looked hack toward the land and waved his cap with a smile. On the shore was a young girl who returned his greeting happily, knowing that in less than a year the man whom she loved would he home again to claim her as his hride.

AMERICAN

PALS (Dec. 2).—Employed on the ranch of Thomas Wells is an old man, Dan Matthews. He is growing more feehle every day and as a consequence is of very little use ahout the place. Virginia, the three-year-old hahy of Thomas and Kathleen Wells, is a constant companion of the old man and they are "pals" to such an extent that she cares more for him than for her own parents. She goes ahout the ranch with him in his work, he makes her toys, tells her hedtime stories and they are ideally chummy. Thomas Wells has discharged from the ranch a workman named Henry Willis and his man, Steve Johnson, for which act they hoth hold a grudge against the ranch-owner. The time has also arrived when he finds himself compelled to let Dan Matthews go, as he has become an actual encumhrance ahout the premises. His wife pleads with him, hut he is ohdurate, and after giving old Dan a wornout cayuse, Wells tells him he can use him no longer. The other "hoys" of the ranch make up a purse for old Dan, which he firmly hut gently refuses. He hids his little pal, Virgie, farewell with a nigh hroken heart, and the little tot is unahle to understand the reason for his departure. His hroken-down nag takes him on his uncertain way and night finds him with the open range for his home, and the saddle which he has taken from his horse when preparing for the night is his resting-place. He is desolate unto despair and self-destruction enters his mind.

After the departure of old Dan, the wife of the rancher is husy ahout household tasks and gives no attention to little Virgie. The little one is lonely without her "pal" and, unahle to find him in the accustomed places ahout the house and ranch, she goes to seek him in the open country. Her search continues until she is worn out, and night finds her also asleep on the open range. Henry Willis and his man are looking for a place to camp for the night and come upon the sleeping child of Thomas Wells, and the revenge which they have heen planning is placed within their hands. They pick up the sleeping child and proceed to camp under a nearhy tree, on the hrow of a hill, and near the spot where old Dan is resting. He is hidden from them hy a slight swell of the range and his moody thoughts are suddenly interrupted hy the sound of strange voices.

THE ANIMAL WITHIN (Dec. 5).—In a lonely region of the Mojave Mountains lived Mother Anne Carey with her handsome son, Jonathan. Their needs were few and their attachment to one another was unusual for persons of their class, rough mountain people. Some miles distant from the hut of Anne Carey and her son was the town where their provisions were secured, and one day while Jonathan is going to the city for their weekly supplies he comes upon the hut of Jane Stevens, a woman who lives near the outskirts of the city, just at the noon hour, and seats himself under a tree near her home to eat the lunch which he has carried with him from his home. She comes out of her hut and they exchange the ordinary courtesies of greeting, after which she offers him refreshment in the form of a cup of water. After accepting and drinking the same he goes on his way. Upon his return to his home that night his mother notices in his actions an attitude of indifference and he goes about as though in a dream. While in the town Jonathan had made the purchase of a shawl and some ribbons as a gift to his mother, but in passing the hut of Jane Stevens on his way home she had come out and asked him to give her the ribbon instead of taking it home to his mother. These actions had been carefully watched from ambush by Hal Evers, an admirer of the woman, Jane Stevens, and he is filled with jealousy. He goes to Jane's hut, calls her to account and, so far as her calloused feelings will allow, grossly insults her.

Jonathan goes to see Jane often and becomes more and more infatuated with her. He neglects his mother and even takes from her the shawl he had given her as a gift and presents it to the Stevens woman. The mother becomes anxious about the doings of her son and notices that he absents himself from home more and more frequently as the days go by. She follows him one day to ascertain his destination and when she learns the truth her heart is filled with misgivings for her boy. Upon his return home his mother reproves Jonathan and warns him that the woman can only have an evil influence over his life, but he gives no heed to her caution. The mother goes to the woman and pleads for her son, but an obdurate ear is turned to her entreaties. The meshes of Jane Stevens enwrap Jonathan more securely every day. Upon one occasion he enters into a fistic encounter with Hal Evers when the admirer had found him in the hut of the woman.

Jane Stevens had a vain nature and desires more gold with which to purchase baubles and finery of attire. She devises a scheme with Hal Evers for a daring holdup of the stage coach and plans to use the unsophisticated Jonathan for a dupe. The woman unfolds her plans to Jonathan and persuades him to commit the deed. At the opportune time and when the "haul" will be sufficient to justify their ends, Jonathan is given the signal by the wicked Jane and he perpetrates the robbery. In his flight he seeks and finds shelter in the hut of the woman. He gives to her the booty and she confers upon him the favor of an embrace in exchange for same. The woman espies the posse in the distance and quickly hurries Jonathan out of the hut toward a clump of underbrush. The posse ride up to the door of the hut and the woman points to the brush, thereby betraying the hiding place of the man who had given more than his life to satisfy her sinful vanity. Jonathan turns and, seeing the posse in pursuit, rushes toward his home and for the first time in many days thinks of the mother to whom had been given his every thought ere the woman of evil entered his life. The posse follow him to his home and tear him from the arms of his mother. A suddenly awakened realization comes to Anne Carey that the entire wrongdoing of her son is due to the influence of Jane Stevens, and the "animal within" her is fired into action. Taking a rifle from the wall of the cabin she rushes to the hut of the woman. Her arrival at the hut occurs during a violent quarrel between Jane Stevens and Hal Evers, who has come to her for his share of the booty. During the disagreement Jane aims the gun at Hal and shoots him. The mother of the wronged Jonathan now rushes upon Jane, making a scathing denouncement of the mischief she has wrought, and shoots her upon her own doorstep without a quaver.

The poor old woman returns to her home. She has had her revenge, but what has it availed? Her heart is heavy. She knows her son shall be given the full quota of the law, and to her troubled soul can come no surcease until the son returns to pick up the thread of life anew in their little mountain home.

BLUDSOE'S DILEMMA (Dec. 7).—Bill Hawkins, with his latest sweetheart, Anita, the Spanish dancer, came from the dance hall, with Anita lovingly leaning on his arm. Iola, an Indian maid of fierce passions, saw the loving pair and, in jealous rage, followed them to Hawkins' cabin.

John Bludsoe, on his claim some two miles from his cabin, made a rich strike. He hurried home, told his wife, had a hasty dinner, concealed the treasure in a trapdoor beneath the floor and went again to work. Mrs. Bludsoe then devoted her efforts toward putting the little child asleep. Bludsoe's strike had been witnessed by Hawkins, who followed him and, through Bludsoe's window, saw the gold secreted. After Bludsoe's departure Hawkins crept through the window and made short work of the treasure. In an adjoining room Mrs. Bludsoe heard the noise and, coming into the living room, at once grappled with Hawkins. The child, awakened by the struggle, asked who was there and, with Hawkins' gun at her throat, Mrs. Bludsoe was compelled to reply "It is your father." She fought again and fell with a bullet in her side.

Hawkins, with the gold, hurried from the house, little knowing that the jealous eyes of Iola, his discarded sweetheart, were upon him. She went straight by the sheriff's window and dropped a missive asking the sheriff to go straight to Bludsoe's cabin. Gathering a posse the sheriff did so, just in time to find Bludsoe kneeling beside his injured wife. The child, in answer to the sheriff's question, said that the father had been with Mrs. Bludsoe, and on this evidence the posse made ready to lynch Bludsoe. Then Iola interfered and the posse gave chase to Hawkins.

But Iola had preceded them. Arriving at Hawkins' cabin she entered without knocking and found Anita and Hawkins examining their spoils. Blocking the door, she bade Hawkins flee and then, drawing her dangerous knife, gave battle to Anita. Anita, with quick Spanish wit, slipped behind the table, drawing her dagger as she did so. A royal battle followed, the forms of the feminine combatants, one torn with wounded pride and jealousy, the other threatened with a frightful death, rocked to and fro across the floor. Just as Iola bent her antagonist across her knee for the death stroke, the posse entered. Anita slipped away. Iola sheathed her knife and followed the posse.

In the meantime Hawkins, with the aid of a rope, had let himself over a dangerous precipice. The sharp edge of the rock bit through the hemp and when his body dangled midway it broke. The posse found a mangled heap of human flesh at the foot of the great divide and wended its way to the Bludsoe cabin, where they found Mrs. Bludsoe smiling happily into the eyes of her husband.

HAWKINS MOVES (Nov. 29).—The Hawkins family learn that they have to move. Mr. and Mrs. Hawkins find and rent a suitable dwelling.

Moving day arrives, the van is packed, and Mrs. Hawkins goes ahead, leaving Hawkins to follow the van and see to its safe arrival.

It is a warm day. Bill and Jim, two typical moving men, suggest to Hawkins the advisability of quenching a consuming thirst. Hawkins, though not a drinker, thinks their request reasonable and agrees. They stop at the first saloon and Hawkins, for the first time, experiences the reviving effects of the foaming fluid.

The company of Bill and Jim is congenial and they linger.

Leaving with the wagon some time later, several stops are made. The stops have had their effect. Hawkins loses his bearing and several hours are consumed hunting for the new home.

Now, after hours of weary waiting, Mrs. Hawkins found Hawkins with the furniture back in the house he originally moved from, and how she, with masterly skill, took charge of the situation contributes to the fun in this original, laughable, true-to-life comedy.

THE REGENERATION OF WORTHLESS DAN (Nov. 25).—John Allison sees the cowboys off on the roundup and is left alone with his wife and baby. Faber and Stern, two horse rustlers, know this and attempt to steal two horses. They are frustrated by Allison and, in an exchange of shots, Faber is badly wounded in the left arm and Allison sustains a flesh wound in his right arm. The men escape. Mrs. Allison binds her husband's arm and rides away for the sheriff and a doctor, leaving the baby and Allison, who is not very badly injured.

Faber is in a black rage at his wound and insists upon returning. Stern accompanies him against his will. Faber creeps up to the ranchhouse door and shoots Allison and rides away. Stern enters the house and sees the man is beyond help. He sees the baby and, thinking it may starve, takes it away with him. He has a long and bitterly cold ride to his mountain shack, and upon his arrival discovers that the child has died from exposure.

Years pass and Stern becomes a horse dealer in a small way. He has kept a pretty little brooch which he found upon the baby as a memory of one well meant dead. He runs across worthless Dan, a boy of eighteen, well meaning but lacking guidance and balance. Stern gives him meat and drink and persuades Dan to accompany him. They call upon Mrs. Allison, who has sold her ranch and purchased a farm and, whilst refusing to buy a horse, she is attracted to Dan, who reminds her strongly of what her boy would have been at his age. Her kindly interest stirs up a desire in the boy's heart for a mother's love, and Mrs. Allison shows him a picture of her lost baby.

The next day Stern shows Dan the baby's brooch and he recognizes the similarity of it to the one in the baby's picture. Stern tells Dan he can pass him off as the widow's son if he (Dan) will do as he is told and help him (Stern) occasionally. Dan, pining for a decent life, consents.

Mrs. Allison is easily convinced and Dan goes to her and soon learns to love this gracious lady, and she trusts him implicitly. One night Stern enters the house and, seeing Dan alone, demands that he break open the safe and go with him. There is a fight, which Mrs. Allison witnesses, and Stern is ejected.

All of Dan's better nature is afire. He confesses the deception in misery, and after a short struggle Mrs. Allison decides that this poor lad shall be her son in any case, and takes him to her heart.

IT HAPPENED THUS (Nov. 29).—The bank fails in which John Allen & Co. have their account, and they are compelled to shut down their factory.

John Allen himself receives the news in his New York office just a few minutes before his sweetheart, Madge Dale, accompanied by her mother, calls to remind him of the party she is giving him that night. He manages to hide his anguish of mind and allows Madge to take him away with her, they both living in the same suburban town. On the same train with them is "Crafty Jim," a clever professional house-breaker, who is searching for a profitable opening for his skill.

Taken by the appearance of Allen, Madge and her mother, he trails them to their homes and learns of her party and the fact that Allen will attend it. After leaving the ladies Allen meets a wealthy friend of his and tries to borrow a sufficient sum to tide him over his difficulties, but the man's friendship melts at sight of Allen's troubles and he refuses coldly. Later, at the party, Allen is made painfully conscious of everyone and he excuses himself and returns home, humiliated and in despair. Now, Allen has the taint of hereditary suicide in his blood and he naturally turns to self-destruction as his sole escape from his troubles. He purchases a bottle of poison and rushes home to put his purpose into operation. He arrives at an unexpected and awkward moment for "Crafty Jim," who has entered during his absence. Allen, however, has no more desire to be interrupted than has Jim and, tossing him his pocketbook, he orders him to leave. Jim wisely withdraws, but continues to hang around, and with surprise witnesses Allen's preparation to die. Jim is crooked by nature, but is not hard-hearted, and Allen's action shocks him beyond expression, and so he again intrudes upon Allen's privacy and tries to make him see things in the right light. This leads to a terrible battle between the men, which ends by Jim knocking Allen out with the butt of his revolver and tying him in a chair. Jim then seeks out Madge, and, persuading her to accept his escort, he brings her to Allen's house and sends her inside with Allen's pass key. Allen has revived and freed himself, and having been literally brought to his senses, has thrown the poison from the window. Madge has wealth of her own which she persuades Allen to accept and which places him once more on his feet. Later, when "Crafty Jim" falls into the hands of the police, Allen and Madge come to his rescue, gain his freedom, and at least endeavor to start him right on the straight and narrow path.

The young wife of John is anxious that the husband win the prize, for there is shortly expected an addition to the family and the money is badly needed. On the morning of the expedition the weather is very stormy and the old fishermen feel that to go out will be dangerous, but John, urged by the wife, goes, even against the protests of the vixen. The big storm that follows breaks up the fishing expedition and many are drowned. Many bodies are washed up on the shore but John never returns. The vixen taunts the young wife with having urged her husband to go on the voyage against the better advice of the others, and eventually makes her believe that she alone is responsible for her husband's death. This drives the wife insane and she wanders the beach day by day looking for the lost one. At last with the idea of still searching for her lost husband she walks into the sea and drowns. The vixen sees her and tries to prevent it, but it is too late, and then, realizing, follows the unfortunate to a watery grave.

FOR THE LOVE OF MIKE (Nov. 30).—Mary is the sole caretaker of her crippled brother, Tom. Mary falls in love with the hero in the book she so often reads to Tom and dreams of loving such a character in life. Her employer ardently admires Mary and desires her for his wife. Tom one day visits the quarry owned by his sister's employer and there meets Mike, a robust, kind Irishman, who invites the little cripple to share his lunch and opinions. A fast friendship springs up between the two. On another visit the boy ventures too near a dangerous point in the quarry and is slightly injured and stunned by a flying piece of stone. Mike is the first to reach him. Mike takes him home and, for the first time, learns of Mary in the boy's delirium. He stays by Tom until Mary returns from the office. At their meeting a mutual interest springs up between the two, which is fostered by a further acquaintance and soon develops into love. Shortly after the incident, Murray elaborately proposes to Mary, offering her wealth, luxury and ease if she will marry him. For the love of Mike she sacrifices all, and refuses. A little later Murray rides out to the quarry with Mary, where she meets Mike. The interest taken in each other by the two convinces Murray that Mike is the obstacle in his path. He discharges Mike. But for the love of Mike the men all quit and refuse to return to work until he is reinstated. The superintendent frantically telephones Murray, telling him of the occurrence. Murray refuses, but when he sees the contracts on his desk necessitating the work to be completed within a stated time, he exclaims, "For the love of Mike!" Mike asks Tom whether he consents and Tom does, for the love of Mike.

THE MASSACRE OF THE FOURTH CAVALRY (Nov. 30).—The action of this story takes place during 1885 in Arizona and the events are historical. The Apache chiefs and sub-chiefs, Naitche, Ketena, Tahchilsa and others, come to the reservation barracks and demand liquor. They are very angry at the refusal given, and Lieutenant Davis, in charge, is apprehensive of trouble.

The Apaches return to camp and make the squaws brew tizwin, their native liquor, which is made from the maguey plant. A scout sees the effects of the brew and notes the braves in full war paint dancing.

The scout reports to Lieut. Davis, who sends Second Lieut. Clark, with a troop of cavalry, to stop the warlike preparations. The troopers go to the Indian camp and the chief is informed that his tribe will be punished if he is not careful. The Indians show their resentment plainly and Chief Mangus's squaw would shoot Clark but for the interference of Mangus.

After their departure the squaw jumps to her feet and cries "Old squaws and children wait for punishment. Braves go on the warpath. I have spoken." She fires them on to action, and with wild whoops and waving of spears and guns they start out to exterminate the paleface upstarts. They fire a pioneer cabin, kill the man and take the woman off.

Clark reports to Davis, who leads a troop to the Indian camp and confiscates the tepees and takes the squaws prisoner, Mangus's squaw, Huera, being among the number.

The Indians swear a terrible oath of vengeance. From their mountain retreat they descend cautiously to the reservation barracks and Chief Mangus climbs the brush stockade and rescues his squaw, Huera. An Indian climbs a telegraph pole and cuts the wires to destroy communication.

Davis deems it advisable to call for reinforcements. He finds the wires are cut. He determines upon an immediate attack and rides after the redskins.

The Indians see them and plan an ambush. They see the troopers enter a pass which leads to a sandy plain. The Indians race across the mountain path, enter the sandy plain and literally bury themselves in the sand. The cavalry comes along and falls into the trap. The Indians rise from the sand on every side and annihilate them, and all that is left the next day are the naked bodies of the dead troopers, left to bleach in the terrible heat of the Arizona sun.

THE TWO CHEFS (Dec. 5).—Jacques and Jules, rival chefs, are rivals in love as well as in business, and Jeanette, their buxom idol, is torn between the two. Jacques has the ascendency, because of the student patronage he holds by virtue of a marvelous sauce for chickens which he prepares from an inherited recipe, kept profoundly secret. Success spoils Jacques, however, and Jeanette, becoming jealous of a little singer who is mocking Jacques' airs, steals the famous recipe, knowing its secret hiding place, and gives it to Jules. Thereupon all of the students flock over to Jules, and Jeanette, with many shrugs, follows the crowd. The darkest hour has arrived for Jacques.

Jules, however, is ungrateful, and does not trust Jeanette with the secret of his hiding place for the scroll, which, of course, makes her angry. So one day while Jules is preparing the sauce, she brings Jacques to the kitchen, and in the struggle which ensues for possession of the precious document, it falls into the fire and burns. Both are desolated. Jules begins at once to berate Jeanette, whereupon Jacques, by his gallantry in protecting her, wins Jeanette back to himself and bears her off in triumph to his own kitchen. There, under the inspiration of her presence, he regains heart and, being persuaded by her, decides to try to make the marvelous sauce without the recipe. Monsieur Gerome passes upon the sauce's verity for the students, and success comes again to stay forever with Jacques, who thus triumphs doubly over his hated rival, Jules.

On the same reel:

But Mabel must have flowers, so Harry takes his dress suit, which is his joy and pride, and pawns it. With the proceeds he buys a beautiful bunch of flowers and takes them to Mabel's house. She is delighted and Harry is very self-satisfied until he learns that he cannot attend her party that evening unless he has a dress suit. Harry is visited by joy and gloom so often that the little fellows become quite friendly with him.

MAJESTIC

AN OLD LOVE LETTER (Nov. 24).—In a family of four girls the youngest, sister Maud, is sweet sixteen; old enough to want to be a young lady and too young to be allowed to have beaux like her older sisters. Maud's mother runs a boarding house and John Bruce makes his home with the family, falling in love with Maud's oldest sister, Dolly. Bruce is shy and cannot nerve himself to tell Dolly of his love. He writes her a note in which he asks her to be his wife, giving it to the maid to deliver. Little sister Maud loves Bruce, but is never even allowed to talk to him. She makes a confident of the maid and they scheme between them to spoil Dolly's love affair. The maid gives Bruce's letter of proposal to Dolly, but Maud gets possession of it later and, putting it in a fresh envelope, gives it to each one of her sisters in turn. They each think that Bruce has made them an offer of marriage and rush to their mother with the glad news, only to discover that he has proposed to each of them. The result is disastrous to Bruce and he leaves town without getting a hearing. Maud repents and tries to get him to remain, but without success. However, she succeeds in making him see that he has overlooked the prize sister of them all, and three years later when he returns to claim her as his bride, he meets the three sisters walking with their husbands, each wheeling a bouncing baby.

SHOCKING HER FUTURE MOTHER-IN-LAW (Nov. 26).—Archie Calvert, medical student, is engaged to Zelda Thorpe, a light opera prima donna. The Calvert family, father, mother and sister, are thrown into different stages of consternation upon receipt of a letter from Archie announcing his engagement. Mr. Calvert, slightly henpecked, is content to let the matter rest in the hands of his masterful wife. Mrs. Calvert has an idea. She invites Archie to bring his fiancee home to spend a week-end. She thinks the contrast between the well-bred deportment of herself and her daughter will serve to bring out the supposed vulgar personality of Zelda, thus curing Archie of his infatuation. Zelda soon realizes why she was invited and decides to "get even." When Archie calls for her Saturday morning he is hardly able to recognize his quiet, demure little sweetheart in the flashy chorus girl who awaits him. Zelda has donned a blond wig, flashy clothes and much rouge. Arriving at the Calvert home, Zelda and her maid, Nora, made up in close imitation of her mistress, upset the dignity of the whole family and fill all with dismay and disgust. Zelda never permits them to forget who is there. Mrs. Calvert, enraged beyond endurance, demands she leave the house. But just before dinner Zelda takes off her disguise and appears before them all as her dainty, pretty self, attired in a plain white evening gown. Hand in hand with Archie she asks forgiveness for the deception. Mrs. Calvert soon sees that Zelda is as refined and cultured as she is herself, and the relief is so great that she willingly gives her consent to the marriage.

OLD MAM'SELLE'S SECRET (Dec. 12).—When the soldiers attacked the old home of the Von Hirschsprung family, the father buried his family treasure in the garden. In the fight that followed he was killed, but his two sons survived. Having no money—and supposing their fortune stolen, the sons sell the old home to the Hellwig family. Cordula, daughter of old Hellwig, falls in love with Joseph, the younger of the Von Hirschsprung boys. He returns her affection—but her father will not permit the marriage, because of Joseph's poverty. One day Cordula, digging in the garden, unearths the Hirschsprung treasure and tells her father, happy now that she will, as she supposes, be able to marry Joseph. But her father makes her vow never to tell of the finding of the money chest. Joseph, deprived of his sweetheart, dies in poverty. Broken-hearted, Cordula removes her things to an upper apartment and vows she will never enjoy any of the ill-gotten wealth. Years later, the only surviving member of the Von Hirschsprungs marries a strolling player. Ten years later she is killed by accident during her act in the circus and her husband, to save his child from a similar fate, turns her over to the care of Nathan Hellwig, brother of Cordula. The child, Fay, finds no welcome in her new home until she meets Cordula, now known as Old Mam'selle. She and Old Mamselle have adjoining attic rooms and spend much time together. Everyone knows that Old Mamselle has a secret—but no one knows just what it is. The years pass. John, son of the Hellwigs, return from the Medical University to fall in love with Fay, who is treated as a sort of upper servant. He is expected to marry Hortense, a rich widow with one child. Fay saves this child from an awful death by fire and wins John's admiration as well as his love. His mother refuses to accept Fay as a daughter. In the midst of all this confusion Old Mam'selle is taken ill. Before she dies she tells Fay that her diary contains her secret and it must die with her. Fay promises to destroy the little book. After Old Mam'selle's death Fay finds the book and is about to destroy it when John enters the room and sees her. He demands that she give him the diary. She refuses at first, but finally yields. Then she goes to her room to pack her things. Feeling herself very unwelcome at the Hellwigs she thinks she had better go away. John opens the little book and reads the whole story of the Hellwig wealth and how it all belongs to the Hirschsprung family—if there are any of them still in existence. He rushes out of the room with the book and finds Fay ready to leave. She has her grip in her hands. He takes it from her and begs her to remain. As he takes the grip he notices the name Meta Von Hirschsprung, with a crest printed across it. He stares at Fay and asks her whose grip it is. She replies it belonged to her mother, who took it with her when she ran away to be married. Then John knows that Fay is the sole remaining member of the once famous Von Hirschsprung family and that the money being enjoyed by the Hellwigs belongs to her. He tells her and she, realizing that she is rich, feels free to accept his heart, offered to her in the days when he did not know she had a single penny to her name. Thus Old Mam'selle's secret righted an old wrong and brought two loving hearts together.

THE SIX GREAT POWERS QUARREL BUT ALL AGREE ON POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH No. 6a

With their great strength and fighting mechanism they crush nations.
POWER'S mechanism crushes all criticism, and its superior construction enables it to stand all tests.
The stamp of public approval has long since been placed on POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH, and to this there is added the favorable comments of Royalty.
The following news item is from the Vienna Extrablatt, one of the prominent newspapers of Austria.

RADY-MALLER, Incorporated.

No. 1 Ward (Bezirk) Biberstrasse No. 15, Vienna, Austria.

Mr. Maximilian Rady-Maller, who is the Proprietor and President of above world-known "Kino Film Co.," has exhibited a number of moving picture projecting mechanisms which are all well known as being the latest and are on the foreground of really improved construction.
The Power's Cameragraph No. 6A, which is noiseless, flickerless and absolutely fireproof, attracted especially the attention of people who are interested as operators, and exhibitors; as well as other professionals.
During this visit to the Kino Exposition, his Imperial Highness the Archduke Leopold Salvator, spoke in terms of the highest praise of the various mechanisms exhibited by the Ray-Maller Company and especially of the Power's Cameragraph No. 6A.

Our factory is the largest of its kind in the world; yet, working day and night, we cannot keep pace with the demand for POWER'S No. 6A.
The trade recognizes the superiority of this machine; our patented loop setter device alone, which resets the lower loop automatically, is controlled by us; and is sufficient to place this machine in a class by itself.
Let us send you catalogue D, giving full details.

A FEW WORDS ABOUT FILM MERITS

THANHOUSER.

"The Forest Rose" in two reels, adapted from the novel of the well-known author, Emerson Bennett, is one splendid triumph for Thanhouser. The work of Marguerite Snow, Messrs. Cruye, Brown, Thompson and others, is almost beyond criticism. From a spectacular point of view there is not a moment lost during the run of this excellent film.

"Frankfurters and Quail," for November 17, has some specially unique and interesting points. It contains good comedy, and the scenes from the carnival at Coney Island worked into the story are a specially pleasing feature.

"Miss Taqu of Tokio," for November 19, is one of the prettiest and at the same time most pathetic of stories. It treats somewhat of racial prejudice, and also of the folly of trying to shape destiny for other than ourselves.

RELIANCE.

"Father," although full of interest, otherwise carefully produced, gives the impression at the finale of having been cut off too abruptly. This is unfortunate, as it is otherwise most satisfactory. the story is centered around a father who sacrificed even his bonor to pay the tuition fees of his son at college.

COMET.

"A Seminary Complication" so far surpasses Comet's former attempts that we are delighted with the production, and have much pleasure in commending it to our readers.

EDISON.

"The Old Reporter" touches specially the bearts of the slaves of the press. It has a strong appeal in human interest. Needless to comment at length on a production by so favorably known a firm as Edison.

"Yellowstone National Park, Wyoming," is what it would be expected to be, beautiful, and at tbe same time educational for those who have not had an opportunity of visiting this wonderful freak of nature.

KALEM.

"The Bachelor's Bride" is a comedy worth while. Tbe chagrin of Miss Brown, the inciter of the rice and confetti reception with which tbe Bachelor is met at the station when he arrives with his newly acquired Prize Puppy, Blanch, when she finds out that the joke is all on her, is a scream.

"I Saw Him First" is also good comedy, but not equal to the former.

"The Pony Express Girl" is a thrilling Western story of bow a girl baffled two outlaws and saved the life of the mail man, and incidentally saved the pocket containing money, which he carried, riding herself to the relay station with the mail bags.

"Days of '49" is exceptionally fine in photographic effect. It is a story of a fight between the early California gold seekers and tbe Indians, and is a very artistically developed picture.

BIOGRAPH.

"My Baby" is one of the most splendidly enacted dramas seen on the motion picture screen for some time. The role of the old granddad who, though he has turned his daughter and his son-in-law out of his house, becomes enamored of the baby, is done par excellence. The story is full of pathos, and there were few dry eyes in the theatre on the particular afternoon on which we reviewed it.

"The Clubman and tbe Crook" is an excellent Biograph comedy—a scream all the way through. The vicissitudes of the clubman while trying to escape the eagle eye of his wife and get out among the fellows, is very funny, and funnier still is his ruse to evade detection in getting back into the house. This is wbere the crook comes in bandy.

LUBIN.

"The Country School Teacher," from the Lubin Studio, is a comedy-drama of rare excellence. To those who have ever had experience in an old-fashioned country school this film is a delight. The atmosphere is there, the school hully. The high-spirited school girl whom the schoolmaster found so hard to conquer and who afterwards became his wife, is splendidly played.

"The Country School Teacher" is unusual in subject. The scenario writer struck a fresh chord in this instance. It is a story of discipline—the breaking of the rebellious spirit of a schoolgirl. The girl afterward becomes the wife of the man who conquered her.

GAUMONT.

"The Burglar Balked," from the Paris Studio, shows splendid work from a child actor. Mlle. Yvette Andreyor, a clever actress of the Gaumont Stock Company, also does good work as the mother.

On the same reel "A Gallop Around Galveston," the city which was some years ago almost destroyed by a tidal wave, is interesting, showing the huge sea wall which has since been erected.

WARNER FEATURE.

"The Raiders of tbe Mexican Border" is par excellence. Specially fine in spectacular effects.

VITAGRAPH.

"The Model for St. John" is a masterpiece to which too much praise could not be given. It is a masterpiece in every respect—photographically, dramatically, and as an artistic production.

"The Professor and the Lady," witb Flora Finch in her usual role of the prim old maid, is just one laugh all the way through. The manner in which the old professor strives after the hand of the 'Lady' is most amusing.

BRONCHO.

"The Civilian" in two reels, has not a quiet moment. Another western story of a battle with the Indians, but cram full of interest, consistent, and in every way a splendid production.

ECLAIR.

"The War in the Balkans" shows a series of scenes in the location of the present Turkish-Balkan war and are specially interesting on that account.

"The Busy Bee." one of Eclair's industrials, is initself an excellent motion picture treatise on the boney bee, showing the bee at every stage of its existence.

"Golden Hair," as a drama, is quite strong. It is the story of a young girl who is the possessor of a wealth of beautiful golden hair, and who, in order to bring dowry that her lover's father insists that his wife must have, is on the point of cutting it off when her lover discovers what she is about to do and interferes. The wealthy woman, to whom she was to sell her hair, takes pity on ber and gives her the money, and the two young people are happily married.

"Constantinople," on the same reel, shows many interesting and instructive bits of life and industry in the Turkish capital.

IMP.

"Officer 171," from the Imp Studio, with King Baggot in the lead, is one fine picture. Human interest is strong in this story, and it is altogether pleasing. It shows the seamy side of a policeman's life when things went wrong at home.

REX.

"Camping Out" is excellent comedy. It is pretty as well and runs without a hitch from the producer's standpoint.

GEM

"The Lighting of Love's Way" is distinctly beautiful in sentiment and production. The story is good, and the moral tone of the play is commendable.

CRYSTAL

"The Gipsy Flirt" and "Man Wanted," on the same reel, are bubbling over with comedy. They are fresh and wholesome and carefully produced.

KINEMACOLOR

"Ofia, the Woman Spy," in two reels, is perbaps the most interesting drama that the Kinemacolor has turned out. As the name would imply, it is full of action—the interest of the story is kept up from first to last

SOLAX

"Flesh and Blood," a Solax 2-reel feature, is especially fine. The story is good, and great care has been taken. Full of thrills, and with a never-flagging interest, it cannot but make a place for itself on the market.

AMERICAN

"Tbe Idyll of Hawaii" is not a wise departure for American. The subject is a difficult one to produce accurately unless the stock company were situated on Hawaiian ground.

"The Would-be Heir" is very excellent, with Jack Kerrigan, Pauline Bush, and that villain of villains, Richardson. Besides its being a drama of interest there is intermingled in the production such splendid bits of business that a number of laughs are created by the innocent actions of the young lovers.

NEARLY A THOUSAND PERSONS OF EDUCATION AND REFINEMENT ATTENDED A

at the Town Hall in Brewster, N. Y., on Friday evening, November 22d. A number of persons came in automobiles. F. S. Holmes, the manager of the show, declared that there were in the audience a millionaire and his family and other wealthy persons living in Brewster and its environs.
The following releases were exhibited:

THE NEW LOVE AND THE OLD
THE WOOING OF ALICE MAKING AN AMERICAN CITIZEN
SEALED LIPS
HIS DOUBLE
THE GLORY OF LIGHT

These the exhibitor rented from the Empire branch of the Mutual Film Corporation of New York. After the performance all were enthusiastic. Mr. Holmes made more money on this occasion than at any one time in the five years he has been running attractions at the Town Hall. This isn't "guff." Ask Holmes and he'll tell you that Solax films "have the punch" and "bring in the coin."

EDUCATIONAL FILMS

ONCE again I take up the cudgels for the educational program, that I may inform my readers what is being done. What a number of "Doubting Thomases" there are in the industry! It seems almost surprising. I cannot understand why the industry is so blind to the vast opportunities that are before it, and why manufacturers are so eager to make money they have no time to do anything for the vast work the educational field opens to them. This field is unlimited and the prospects of the future are unbounded. Two or three schemes are advertised, and some one is going to make the most wonderful progress it is possible to conceive. For the last twelve years educational films have been made by one or two advanced individuals, and to-day they are reaping the benefit of their experiments and their toil. Teachers' associations, colleges and universities are asking where it is possible to rent machines and films, and while some are sleeping others are trying to fill this void. Some manufacturers say, "Show me, I am from Missouri; and when I see where I can make money and get my returns back, then, and only then, will I make the films that are needed." Is not this short-sighted policy? My contention is that if there was a supply, and a great supply, the demand would be created immediately. I have repeatedly had to answer questions from educationalists, referring them to a few of the films that are now on the market, which they have obtained and used over and over again and now they ask for more.

It was while expressing my opinion of the lack of a good supply of educational programs to my friend, Rich G. Hollaman (who has been the pioneer in this work with all the exhibitions at the Eden Musee), and he told me that from his vast collection of films and his great love for the progress of educational Cinematography he is prepared to grant to any educational institution the use of all his films, free of cost, providing they will make arrangements for the use of a machine and an operator. This is an offer too good to be hid under a bushel measure. I therefore asked further particulars and he handed me the following program that was given before the Brooklyn Teachers' Association on Thursday evening, October 31st:

1. Geography
   a. The Banks of the Ganges—India
   b. The Region of Ararat—Russia
2. Agriculture
   a. A Model Farm in Argentina
3. Scenes from Bird Life
   a. Royal Swans, Eider Ducks, Etc.
4. Natural History
   a. From Moth to Butterfly
   b. The Life History of the Otter
5. Zoology
   a. Hatching Fish at Surrey, England
6. Literature
   a. Hiawatha and Minnehaha
7. Chemistry
   a. Chemical Action on Aluminum, Magnesia, Etc.
8. Botany
   a. The Wonders of Plant Life—A Day in the Life of a Snow Drop—Autumn Colchicum—Tulips Opening in the Sun—Nasturtiums—Roses and other Flowers
9. Biology
   a. From the Egg to the Chick—The three weeks' life process made visible by speed magnification.
10. Physical Culture
    a. Reedham Boys at Drill—remarkable evolutions

The above is a specimen program and this is only one of a series that Mr. Hollaman has at his disposal, being part of the collection he has been making for the Eden Musee. I asked Mr. Hollaman what he expected to gain from letting this out free. His reply was that he was anxious to show the whole world what educational progression had been made and how easy to make up a full program for the edification and assistance of the public. The action of Mr. Hollaman should be emulated by every one who has the desire of the highest and most elevated aspect of Cinematography, and I commend this to the attention of every exhibitor in the country who desires in his locality to make a special feature of the educational possibilities of the film before learned heads in his locality. It seems almost as though "I am a voice crying in the wilderness," but when such beautiful programs as the above can be had for the asking and the films are a commercial quantity, which every exhibitor can get for his theatre if he wished, why use the murders, stabbings, the burglaries, the hold-up and such like foolish pictures that are beginning to feel their way into the ranks again to-day?

Take the synopses of the films of one issue of the Moving Picture News and therein we find schemings, intrigues, suicides, criminality, vengeance, drunkenness, jealousy and duels, robbery, and murder, and again a murder, gambling, etc., through the whole list, and not one single manufacturer can be pointed out as being the offender in this respect, but some of the manufacturers have no respect for the Censorship Board of Public Opinion. All they think about is the result of their sales, of so many films per week, and then if their sale of films drops off for one or two weeks they wonder why. It is not the bad photography or the bad development. Nothing can be said on this score, but it is the bad subjects and gruesome billposters that scare the public, that is—the right-thinking public—away from their houses. We want more men of the type of Rich G. Hollaman, who has the courage of his convictions and who is essentially a pioneer in the educational propaganda of Cinematography.

RICH G. HOLLAMAN

The above cut is from the latest photograph of my good friend of whom I speak in the editorial column. In addition to what I say there, I want to mention the fact that Mr. Hollaman was the first man to see the great possibilities in the educational field. It has been a dream of his for years past to see the art elevated to its very highest pinnacle of artistic and educational possibilities.

Fourteen years ago Mr. Hollaman produced the opera "Martha" and also The Passion Play. In those days, as my readers can well imagine, it was very costly to experiment with the ordinary make of films, which did not exceed 100 to 200-foot subjects, and when I tell you that The Passion Play was the first three-reel subject ever produced taking 3,000 feet of film great credit must be given to Mr. Hollaman, who dared venture to expend the sum of $16,000 for these productions, and still more interesting, when I say that these two negatives were sold by Mr. Hollaman to the Edison Manufacturing Co., and are still listed in their catalog.

What an interesting subject this would make to-day, and if the readers of The Moving Picture News would write to the Edison Company asking them to reproduce these subjects, if the negatives are in good condition, I feel sure that a most interesting feature of an American enterprise would be more than appreciated by the moving picture lovers of to-day.

Alfred H. Saunders.

MR. H. B. COLES

We do not know of a man in the industry more extensively known than Mr. H. B. Coles, whose travels from one end of the country to the other have made him conversant with every exchange man and they to him. In assuming the general management of the Precision Machine Company, this company has secured a most valuable man to further the sales of the Simplex machine.

GENERAL FILM PUBLICITY AND SALES CO. AGENTS FOR RUSSIAN BRAND

It is announced that the General Film Publicity and Sales Co. has been appointed sole agent for the Cossack brand of films in America. The Cossack film is of Russian manufacture, and the subjects which they present are full of the thrill and atmosphere of Russian life.

Mr. White, president of Local Branch No. 2, introduced Mr. Neff, Mr. Trigger and Mr. Jacobs, who delivered addresses that were well received. After the meeting was over, a banquet was served and several of the members, with the national and state officers, went to Troy and visited with several of the local members of the League.

On Tuesday morning, Mr. Neff and Mr. Trigger went to Boston. On their arrival at 2:55 in Boston, they were met by Mr. Washburn and Mr. Swette and several other Boston exhibitors, who accompanied them to the Hotel Essex and enjoyed a pleasant and enjoyable evening with several of the exhibitors of Boston.

At 2 p.m. the Massachusetts state convention was called together at Memorial Hall on Washington street, and the following officers were elected: Joseph Mack, of the Hub Theatre, Boston, president; A. ADDRESS OF M. A. NEFF AT BOSTON.

From my boyhood until the present time I have always had a longing desire to visit Massachusetts, and especially Boston. Having read the history of the thirteen colonies, and so often hearing the traditions of historical Boston, it affords me great pleasure to meet with you here today.

Through the courtesy of Mr. Sweet and Mr. Washburn, it has been my pleasure today to visit a few of the historical places of your city. I have been pleased more than I can ever tell you to have been your guest and viewed the spot where the tea party took place, and the thoughts that forced themselves upon me when visiting the historical spot where the first blood of the patriots was spilled caused me to wonder if those patriots suffered with the realization that they were establishing the grandest republic on the face of the earth, and to liberate millions of people, and defied the powers that denied them religious, political and commercial freedom. Now that I have visited some of the historical points and have viewed them with my own eyes, I wish to assure you that a longing desire has been gratified, and at this day I feel thankful to those grand old patriots who stood so loyally by the principles which they defended and believed in. And through their efforts a grand republic was born, and we today enjoy the fruits of their labor, privations and patriotism.

I have another ambition that I hope to gratify, and that is to organize the motion picture exhibitors of Massachusetts into an organization that will work thoroughly and harmoniously to better the condition of our line of business and promote and place cinematography on the highest plane possible. I cannot help but have faith in the ancestry of the patriots of Colonial times. I therefore come to your city firmly believing that you will organize and co-operate together, that you may assist in eliminating the undesirable conditions which have crept into the motion picture business. We have been unjustly criticized by those who know the least about our business and are least qualified to censure or condemn. We are educating and amusing millions; we are doing all in our power, as an organization, to eliminate suggestive and immoral pictures and to bring about a healthy, clean condition, so that the most skeptical will be convinced that the motion picture is not only the greatest educator the world has ever known, but the advance agent of the highest standard of civilization. I am pleased to meet with you and to receive you into the organization that means so much to you and to every exhibitor through the world. Petty strifes and jealousies should have no place among the motion picture exhibitors. It is our duty to co-operate together, in order that we may be effective and bring about conditions that will demonstrate to the world that we are earnest business men; that we are striving to uplift and amuse the world. Our organization is co-operative with many lady organizations and societies, which is of a great assistance to our organization. The advanced thinkers and educators of the age are turning to cinematography for insipration and guidance. Of all the lines of business or professions, there are none others so potential to the welfare of the human race as the motion picture. It is the cornerstone of our education and progressive civilization. In the near future, Boston will be teaching in the public schools with motion pictures, and the boys and girls at the age of fifteen will be more thoroughly educated than they are now at the age of twenty-one, and many of the preachers who are now condemning the motion picture will be enthusiastically lecturing the pictures in the churches, and the churches will be crowded instead of being partly empty, as they now are.

The day and age of witchcraft is passed and gone. Ignorance and superstition no longer have a place or are discussed by our high civilization, and, like witchcraft, soon the day of criticism of the motion picture will be passed and adverse legislation and ignorance will disappear by reason of the camera and the curtain.

I will carry back to Ohio pleasant remembrances of Massachusetts and Boston and of the many incidents and things that I have seen while here, and hope to retain them in memory by reason of their pleasant associations.

FEATURE FILM MANUFACTURERS ORGANIZE

The realization of co-operation to such an extent seems at a glance almost Utopian. Each manufacturer retains his individuality, producing his own special brand of picture as before; but, if at any time an idea is given birth in his mind too stupendous in proportions to admit of his carrying out his scheme by himself, he is privileged to hand it in to the organization and thereby materialize his idea in film, backed by the organization. The film in that event will of course become the property of the organization, the stockholders gleaning each his share of the profits through the dividends of the company.

At a meeting of feature manufacturers and representatives of foreign manufacturers held at the Hotel Astor, November 21, 1912, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, there was formed a temporary organization known as the Feature Manufacturers Association. The meeting was called to order by Counsellor Tobias A. Keppler, who had acted as counsel for the organization committee which was composed of eight manufacturers. He outlined the views of the committee upon the question of organization and conducted the meeting until the organization was given its name and officers were elected. The following are the officers of the organization:

President—Hans A. Spanuth, of the General Film Publiicty & Sales Company.

Vice-President—Mr. E. Barry, of the Ambrosio American Company.

Treasurer—Mr. Sidney Ascher, of the Atlas Manufacturing Company.

Secretary—Mr. Tobias A. Keppler.

Sergeant-at-Arms—Mr. Roskam, of the World's Best Film Company.

Nearly every feature manufacturer doing business in America was present; they came from Boston, Chicago, St. Louis, etc.

A few manufacturers who were not present have evidenced their intention of attending the next meeting, which will be held in a very short time.

A Committee of Ways and Means was appointed consisting of the following:

Mr. Kaufman, of the famous Players Company.

Mr. Clements of the "Big C" Features.

Mr. Erb, of the Crystal Film Company.

Mr. Jablin, of the Fine Arts Company, Inc.

Mr. Draher, of the International Film Traders.

They, together with the officers, are to provide for the incorporation of the new organization and will submit suggestions at its next meeting outlining its proposed work and scope.

The meeting was a success far in anticipation of anything the committee had hoped for. Without exception, every member present expressed his views in favor of the project. Among other matters the question of protecting productions by copyright was discussed.

The manufacturers present were unanimous in the view that feature films should represent the highest possible achievement in moving pictures from every point of view, so that they would be features in fact as well as in name, so that the feature business would be encouraged, so that in time the exhibitor may have an exclusive feature program.

A census of the thirty members was taken, and it was found that each manufacturer had three or four film subjects ready for the market, and two or three of them had as many as eight.

The question is, of course, how many to place on the market at one time. This question will, however, be discussed at length by the Ways and Means Committee at a meeting which will be held by them very shortly, and will be brought a litle later before the entire organization for their approval.

Already over 200 theatres have made application for the program of the organization and have expressed a desire to use exclusively this feature film program.

GAUMONT CAMERA MEN IN THE EAST SECURING VALUABLE WAR FILMS

Motion pictures of warfare have not been the heritage of our eyes, inasmuch as the Stock Exchange has in modern times proved greater than the bullet. The Biblical prophecy that there shall be wars and rumors of wars is becoming superannuated. We have now in progress, however, a conflict which will change the map of Europe, a conflict which has shorn the Turk of his appellation "The Terrible." The Gaumont Company has, and is, taking pictures of the scenes of carnage in the near East that will remain in the archives of history. They are pictures not of men killing time, but of men killing men. They have the force and strength of photographs of real warfare, not the puerility of mimic combat. The spectator feels thrills in realizing that this infantry on the double quick, these scouts deploying in the brush, this field artillery maneuvering for strategic points, are firing real bullets, not blanks—that they are aiming at men, not concentric targets.

It will be surprising to the mass of people who have formed an opinion of the armies of these smaller states that they are of the comic opera variety, with twenty officers to every private, and where epaulets and brass buttons are more formidable than marksmanship, to perceive the stern, business-like manner in which these martial men go after the enemy. There is no playfulness, no trimmings of spear-carrying chorus girls or soprano-throated chorus men. Every soldier puts his cartridges into his repeater with the fond hope that each will find a lodgment in a human body, and there is grim care in the precision with which they train their deadly arms upon the men who, in the distance, seek a similar end.

The Gaumont camera men are centered over the various armies with both conquerors and being conquered. With the Allies and in the plague-stricken trenches before Constantinople, whose fanatics in their death under fire see speedy passage to Paradise.

There are pictures of the people in the besieged city where they of Christian faith cower in their homes, fearful of the moment when the defeated Musselmen will begin a new Reign of Terror, a St. Bartholomew's Eve that will cause the city of Constantine to flow with rivers of blood. There are scenes of those benign Sisters of Mercy, the Society of the Red Cross, to whom Mussulman and Christian are but suffering men in need of cool, deft hands and the kindness and science that alleviates mortal pain. These Balkan war pictures are being rapidly dispatched to America. Some have arrived. In action and quality they increase in merit with every new reel.

THE BONNIE BANKS O' LOCH LOMOND

Eclair, December 3d

Those who admire Miss Barbara Tennant—and they are legion—will see their pretty favorite in one of her very best of recent parts. As she carries the burden of the story, she must perforce have the volume of praise. She is excellent. Her part, as she performs it, probes deep into the sad recesses of the spectators' hearts.

Most of the Eclair stock company work in and out of the story, so we see Alec Francis, Will Sheerer, Guy Hedlund, Julia Stuart and dear, darling little Clara Horton.

The story is touching but ends satisfactorily. It runs as follows:

McDonald is incapacitated by a serious illness and his little family is obliged to resort to the income of a small deposit which they have in the bank.

The invalid, with his wife, Clara, and their baby, was being entertained one day by a friend, who, to the accompaniment of his bagpipe, was singing some native ballads.

Mr. and Mrs. Sloan, while touring through Scotland in their automobile, are attracted by the plaintive Scotch airs and stop to listen.

Clara draws the attention of the tourists who see in her a probable nurse for their child. They propose that she come with them to America, but the little woman does not wish to leave her husband and baby.

The following day the McDonalds learn that the bank in which their savings were deposited had failed and that they are left destitute. At the same time, the tourists write to Clara and again propose that she go with them, offering the inducement of $500 a year if she consents. In their dire need Clara feels it her duty to accept and tearfully she parts from her husband and little one.

Clara is in her new home and proves a conscientious nurse. One day the neighbor's children place a phonograph near the garden hedge, turn it on and. Clara, startled, recognizes the familiar strains of "The Bonnie, Bonnie Banks o' Loch Lomond." The children leave the phonograph for a while, and Clara, leaning over the hedge, takes the instrument to her side of the garden—she feels she must hear the dear tune again.

The children, returning, miss the phonograph and see Clara disappearing with it. They rush in and tell the story to their grandmother. Enraged, she immediately notifies the police and then hastens to inform Mr. and Mrs. Sloan that Clara is a thief. The police arrive in the meantime and they all repair to the garden in search of the culprit. There—oblivious to all else—the poor homesick little woman is listening to the strains of the old Scotch ballad.

As the police make a move forward, Mrs. Sloan, recognizing the air, restrains them; her husband, too, understands, and they explain. All realize then what has happened and quietly leave the nurse to her dreams.

That same evening Clara found in her room a beautiful, new phonograph, ready at all times to play for her the old song which brought such dear visions of her beloved Scotland, her baby and its father.

STARTLING NEW PRODUCTION IN PREPARATION BY HOCHSTETTER UTILITY COMPANY

Contracts have been closed between the Hochstetter Utility Company and the authors of a spectacular production to be known as the Modern Babylon. Among the great features of this production will be a reproduction of the famous Hanging Gardens of Babylon. Messrs F. M. and P. M. Pierson, of Briarcliff Manor, have arranged to reproduce these gardens even superior to those of ancient Babylon in the time of Solomon. These pictures will be made by the celebrated Hochstetter process in natural color, and will be the most stupendous undertaking ever attempted by a Film Company in the history of the art. The picture itself will be an allegory using New York City, the modern Babylon, as its background, and will be startling in its reality. It will show New York to the New Yorkers in a manner that will be so vivid that even the most blase will pause in awe and wonderment. This picture, like all productions of the Hochstetter Company, will not be marketed, but will be used by them for exhibition purposes only, showing, as it will, the grades of society in the modern Babylon. It will be startling in its truth, and the means of preaching a sermon to the masses not possible in press, pulpit or stage.

BIG HATS A NUISANCE

If there is anything that is more tantalizing to a man than a big hat it has not yet been discovered. If there is ever a time when he should get forgiveness for using bad words 'tis when he sits down in a picture show after a day of hard thinking, way up in front, satisfied that he has escaped the feathery umbrella atmosphere of the millinery shops, to find all of a sudden, that his vision has been obscured by a dark cloud, directly in front, which keeps bobbing from the right to the left at each effort he makes to gain a view of pictures which grow more excitingly real at each moment.

Through a tiny peep-hole he may sometimes gaze, gathering glimpses of things beyond, all the time quietly peeping, that's all; while even a saint would feel like stepping down from his pedestal at such temptations, and give vent to his feelings.

A recent occurrence in Atlanta, the experience of an eminent divine, goes to show how well he understands women and which may in part account for the fewer number of hats constituting the daily scenery in so many of the shows. Rev. Dr. Blank, finding that the efforts of other ministers in getting ladies to remove their hats in church were fruitless, got up one morning in pulpit and said: "Ladies, with the styles of to-day I know that it is necessary that much false hair be used in the arrangement of the coiffure, and that it is hard on account of it to pin your hat back substantially, so I am only going to ask those who have no artificial puffs and curls, but their own wealth of hair, to please remove their hats so as not to distract the attention of the gentlemen behind."

'Tis not necessary to say that every hat in church was hurriedly discarded.

Adage: "A woman's crowning glory is her hair." In other words, any woman has so little policy as to obstruct one's view with her hat, instead of displaying her locks for the admiration of the sterner sex, deserves to have said to her, "Ladies will and others must remove their hats."

FOLLOWING in the wake of the daily newspaper, the magazines of this country have suddenly recognized the importance of the moving picture and, during the past few weeks, a number of the popular periodicals have published interesting feature articles praising the animated picture. The importance and power of the industry; the great fortunes suddenly made and unmade; the personalities of the actors and actresses and the amounts of their salaries; and, best of all, the benefits to be derived from the moving picture, all these points are being enthusiastically recounted. We believe the turning point has been reached and that the campaign waged in pulpit and press some years ago against the industry has about come to a close. Magazine editors, like newspaper editors, have suddenly realized that sentiment among the better classes favor the moving picture, and in order to get into the front ranks of the progressive parade, investigations should be made. Such investigations have almost invariably led to pleasure and profit. It is a long lane that has no turning, and the moving picture, seemingly, is coming into its own.

* * * *

The December McClure's Magazine prints a delightful résumé of the moving picture industry. The article was written by Bennet Musson and Robert Grau. The article is embellished by pictures of Owen Moore and his wife, Mary Pickfort Moore, and with western studio scenes and a picture of Kalem players in Egypt. We quote from the article:

> The public is at last awakening to the fact that the early twentieth century has evolved an entirely new form of dramatic entertainment. At the present moment the American people are spending $500,000 a day on moving picture shows. There are at least 20,000 places in the United States that are devoted to this form of popular amusement. Not far from 300,000 people, in New York City alone, daily witness these performances. In the United States, half a million people are engaged directly or indirectly in the moving picture industries, and the varied business represents an investment of $200,000,000. And the motion picture is more than a diverting photographic toy. It has created a new class of theatregoers, a new type of theatre, a new kind of actor, and a new species of dramatic writing. Its use as an agency in education, in political and social reform, is already widespread. Though it was generally despised a few years ago as a demoralizing influence, there are those who foresee the time when it will be extensively used in the public system of education, in the colleges, the scientific laboratories, and even in churches and Sunday schools.
> As a force for the entertainment and enlightenment of the masses, the moving picture machine probably finds its closest parallel in the printing press.

When McClure's Magazine asserts that the moving picture machine as a source of enlightenment of the masses closely parallels the printing press, it certainly pays a great tribute to the moving picture industry.

The use of the moving pictures in developing cities is ably treated in an article by Leo L. Redding in the November "Town Developments," one of the most influential journals of its kind in the world. Mr. Redding shows how Omaha, Burlington, Ia.; Gary, Ind.; Missoula, Mont.; Oshkosh, Wis.; Kalamazoo, Mich.; Battle Creek, Mich.; Little Rock, Ark.; Manitowoc, Wis.; Elkhart, Ind., and a number of other cities have had motion picture films made of views of those cities and exhibited elsewhere, to show just what is being accomplished in industrial and public improvement lines. Omaha conducted a campaign during which the city was written up from sixteen different angles. Motion pictures of Omaha scenes were displayed at home and abroad, and the pictures appealed strongly to the residents of smaller places near and distant. Omaha and the other cities which have turned to the moving picture as an advertising medium have profited largely from the enterprise. It has been the custom of the more enterprising boards of trade to advertise their home cities in periodicals and newspapers. This class of advertising is being abandoned for the moving picture, considered the greatest medium of all.

Then, to show that the moving picture has further possibilities, little dreamed of two years ago, Kansas, the "Sunflower" state, is turning its attention to the municipal moving picture show. The idea was first started at Haven, a little town in Reno county, Kansas. Haven is small, and once a week had a picture show. Everyone in the little town enjoyed the pictures. No one was willing to risk his money in building a moving picture theatre, so all the business men in the town contributed to the fund and the show was started. It is a great success. The pictures were first shown in the town hall every night. An admission fee was charged, to pay a good operator and to pay for the film service. The town built an airdrome theatre. During the last summer the picture shows were given in the open air. Haven's enterprise in keeping money at home, attracting the country boys to the town on Saturday nights, and furnishing relaxation from the dreary monotony of a small village life, attracted attention of state officials, and the scheme will be tried out in rural communities all over Kansas. The Country Life Commission, first organized by former President Roosevelt, is also interested, it is said.

Another influential magazine recently published an article dealing with the educational and industrial picture plays and praising them. Edison's "Red Cross Christmas Seal" releases, woman suffrage plays, the "Seeing America First" series, the industrials on the care of the teeth, showing the ravages of tuberculosis, etc., were highly commended. Then the change of sentiment in the church for moving pictures was mentioned. We believe that men like Rev. Dr. Stockton, of New York, are in no small way responsible for the interest being manifested by religious denominations in the moving picture. The Eastwood Congregational church, of Columbus, Ohio, one of the most influential denominations in the Middle West, is the latest church to install a moving picture machine. The pastor believes that with the use of moving pictures the church has great possibilities for the educational, moral and religious uplift of the people. A 1913 model of the improved motiograph was installed. Rev. W. A. Woodring says that with the machine the church's usefulness to its community can be augmented by illustrating with the moving picture the great truths of scripture and history, and present in a more impressive manner the great social and moral needs of the day.

Despite the assertion by some authorities that the standard of the moving picture must be raised, we believe that the standard is being raised by the manufacturers, and raised by leaps and bounds. The improved output is impressed upon our mind by the sentiment displayed by clergymen, educationalists and others, who would evince no such interest were the pictures on the same plane as two years, or even one year, ago. The picture producers seem to have set a high standard, and we believe that they are doing all in their power to realize that standard. Film releases of educational and moral worth, beautiful scenic and industrial pictures, are being more frequently filmed, and the classics are being featured in a more careful and comprehensive manner. Another year will see even greater advances made in the excellence of the pictures than ever before is our firm belief.

And in conclusion we would urge more of the home pictures. Releases picturing the every-day life of the common people, with the simple every-day problems that confront so many in this day and age. Quiet and convincing action is essential as a relief from the play of high tension and of western gunplay. Perhaps some of the producers will not coincide with this statement. However, were they permitted to visit the rural picture show, or to serve on the staff of a trade journal and look over hundreds of letters received weekly from all sections of the country, they would appreciate the truth of the assertion. Give us more pictures of the common people, the laborer, the artisan, the farmer. Present their every-day needs and their vital problems with a care to correct characterization. Then will cinematography have made another important advancement. We believe that Edison and some few other companies are working on this policy, and we confidently look toward others to fall into line. A little less attention to plays filmed to please in foreign countries and more attention to the wishes of audiences in Uncle Sam's domain might be a policy worthy of serious consideration.

ANOTHER GAUMONT FEATURE
(Three reels)

"An International Consipracy," another excellent Gaumont state's rights proposition, was reviewed by the writer just recently, and with the greatest satisfaction. It is full of sensation, as would naturally be expected of a story which deals, as does this one, with a conspiracy to confiscate plans of the fortifications of a nation. This thrilling story is told in three reels and is not an inch too long, so far as the interest is concerned.

After a series of adventures and interesting episodes, the tools of the conspirators enter the home of the French admiral, bind and gag him, and break open the safe, taking with them the packet which is supposed to contain the coveted plans.

Previous to this, however, the secret service man who is working on the job for the French nation has secretly absconded with the real plans, placing at the same time other papers in their place, thereby outwitting the conspirators.

The story is consistently worked out, and has interspersed in it many beautiful and otherwise interesting scenes. It may be predicted for the Gaumont company that if they continue the good work which they have begun in their states rights proposition they are bound to meet with success.

J. PARKER READ, JR., PROGRESSING FAVORABLY

We are glad to learn that J. Parker Read, Jr., who has recently undergone an operation in a hospital at Washington, D. C., is progressing favorably, and will no doubt soon be about again.

Mr. Read is well known to most of our readers as a most energetic film man, always gripping that which is newest and best in the trade.

EXIT MRS. JULIUS STERN

A rather amusing mistake was unfortunately made in the account of the Exhibitors' Ball which appeared in our last issue. Among the names of the guests appeared the name of a Mrs. Julius Stern in addition to that of Mr. Julius Stern, but it seems that the lady in question has not materialized up to date. It was Miss Jeanne Acker, the ingenue of the Imp stock company, who was mistaken for the myth.

HALLBERG RECTIFIER-ECONOMIZER

Changes Alternating into Direct Current

The above cut shows the new Hallberg Rectifier-Economizer for which Mr. Hallberg claims that it has all the most valuable improvements and additions it is possible to get into a transformer. It is claimed that this machine will give absolute illumination, changing A C to D C. He said it will enable you to produce an absolutely even illumination on your screen of the greatest possible intensity, surpassing in this respect even the illumination obtained by operating on the regular Edison direct current system on 110 v. with large rheostat in series, giving the same number of amperes at the arc. This is possible because with the Hallberg Rectifier-Economizer there is no "mist" in front of the positive crater, on account of the arc flame being reduced to a minimum, and those of our readers who desire further particulars should write for the descriptive circular and thereby save current expenses at the same time getting the best possible light from the current they use.

WASHINGTON SOCIETY FOLKS AT MOVING PICTURE THEATRE

The attendance at the Garden Theatre, and likewise the box-office receipts, have been increasing by leaps and bounds. This is the largest playhouse exclusively devoted to pictures, using features and single reels. The independent service is installed here. One of the chief causes of the popularity of the Garden is the excellent orchestra, which knows just how to interpret the pictures. There is no monotony of time or tone, but a change from soft music to dramatic, to bombast, to ragtime, comedy and pathos as the scene suggests. The pictures are not the only things that attract the audience; the music plays a goodly part in the popularity or non-popularity of a theatre—at least, this is the case in the Capital City.

* * * *

The recent establishment of the International Feature Company in this city, with offices in the Bank of Commerce, is a welcome addition to this industry. Manager W. R. Mack, who has had many years of experience in the film exchange business, makes an excellent head, who is a hustler with a convincing argument. His territory includes the District of Columbia, Maryland, Virginia and North Carolina. Already Mr. Mack reports encouraging progress. Several of the local houses are using this feature service in addition to the regular service, and they find it advantageous.

During the past week or so a number of musicians, members of the editorial staffs of the local newspapers, teachers, professional men and women, dramatic critics, social folks, and dramatic directors with their pupils, have frequented the motion picture theatres. For some of these it was their first visit to such amusement houses; some had seen such exhibitions on but few occasions. All this was occasioned by the local interest taken in the presentation of the Lubin film of "The Country School Teacher," the latest photoplay by Willard Howe, of this city. The consensus of opinion was praise for the play with its underlying theme of discipline, and high commendation for the naturalness of presentation by the company. Certainly Willard Howe created something of a stir in high society, which caused managers to wonder at their patrons, and the outlook is that many "regulars" and some "fans" will be produced as a result of causing these folks to discover just what the motion picture show is like. At the Masonic Temple Auditorium "The Country School Teacher" received applause at the conclusion of the reel, while the young author, who chanced to be discovered among the spectators, was surprised with a most enthusiastic reception at the rear of the hall.

The Exhibitors League resumed the meetings this month with increased membership and greater enthusiasm. With Dr. Herbst, manager of the Circle, as president, and Fulton Brylawski as secretary, there is every reason to believe the organization is in good hands. Though it was rumored that the moving picture operators had planned to strike for higher wages, no such final step has been taken as yet, and from conversations with various managers, there is little fear of such a movement. The operators have, however, presented some propositions to the Exhibitors' League as to time, salary and duties. These are under consideration by a committee to be reported on shortly.

Local exhibitors welcome Mr. Bradley again in the office of the Independent Exchange, assisting the Mutual Film branch. Mr. Bradley has had experience in this sort of business for some years and was at one time associated with the Washington Film Exchange. He seems to be the right man in the right place.

PORT LAVACA, TEX.—Kamey Bros. store building is being remodeled for an opera house. Jno. Juliff, manager.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.—Louis J. F. Moore, architect, has completed plans for a new theatre building at the nortbeast corner Fifty-second Street and Cedar Avenue.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

A WORD FROM THE VICTOR EDITRESS

THE Victor Film Manufacturing Company is one of the later entrants into the producing game, but behind the scenes are some of the oldest and most versatile heads in the moving picture profession. The Victor pictures immediately leaped into public favor, and the principal reasons were logical and entertaining stories and able directorship. Giles R. Warren, former editor for Imp, Lubin, Powers, etc., has been directing the Victor stock company. His masterly dramatic touch was readily discernible and has been heartily appreciated by those "in the know." Through his long experience on the legitimate stage and his ability as a dramatist, Mr. Warren was enabled to show some of the veteran directors a thing or two when once he threw his hat into the ring. It is often difficult for directors to work satisfactorily with editors. Mr. Warren searched the editorial field carefully, and finally selected a young woman virtually new to the editorial ranks and engaged her as script editress for the Victor company. Of course, Miss Christine Van Buskirk had the advantage of the tutelage of one of the most able writers and editors in the business, but she also had much inherent talent, and now she has assumed her rightful position in the hearts and minds of the script writers' army. She knows a good script when she sees it; can delve underneath the written words for hidden talent, and is courtesy personified to the contributors. We are pleased to introduce Miss Van Buskirk to our readers, and her portrait speaks for itself. Miss Van Buskirk kindly presents Victor demands to script writers in the following:

> Since we have a new leading lady, Miss Fritzi Burnette, our wants in the scenario line have changed somewhat. We are no longer looking for stories with a strong female lead, but are rather in need of a strong male lead just at present, as Mr. Moore is to be supported by Miss Fritzi, and in all the stories there is always "a woman in the case," which affords her plenty of opportunity to show her good work. The scripts we have been receiving lately have averaged very poor, and we waste much time going over much mediocre stuff. I guess anyone knowing how to write is trying luck at script writing, but they little know how much is connected with it and what there is to learn. I have found there is always something more to learn, no matter how much you think you know. We pay the highest price for available stories and welcome talented writers who have the goods to deliver.

Experienced writers, now knowing Victor needs, are advised to contribute to that company. We can assure them prompt and courteous consideration.

A Line from "Pop" Hoadley

Editor C. B. Hoadley is turning out some great sure-fire stuff for the Universal these days. Such current releases as "A Red Man's Love," "The Honor of the Family," "An Old-Fashioned Mother," "Camping Out," etc., are hot from the Hoadley Remington. Recently the trade journal department editors, fearless and conscientious enough to take a decided stand against grafting "schools," have been made the targets for personal villification and abuse from the publishers of obscure "catalogues" printed solely to get the advertising patronage of the "professors" who are refused admission to the advertising columns of several journals. Many of the editors, appreciating that we have endeavored to lighten their tasks considerably, have written to us letters in which they cordially support our campaign waged for the better protection of the writers. C. B. Hoadley, whom we consider an authority in the editorial line, writes as follows:

> About these "scenario schools." From my observation, it is a case of the blind leading the blind. To my knowledge, not one of the "instructors" ever made a success writing picture plays, and I cannot by any stretch of the imagination see how they can impart knowledge that they do not possess. I have had hundreds of stories submitted to me by the middlemen in various cities, and I have never purchased any of the stories. I have read hundreds of scripts in which the authors made note of the fact that they were graduates (?) of some school. Their styles of writing scripts do not vary much from the first, or one of the first, forms sent out by the Imp company, and the stories, as a rule, are woefully lacking in dramatic worth. I would advise all aspiring script writers to steer clear of the mail instruction course, if my observations are any criterion by which to judge.

Here is a kindly and disinterested warning volunteered by one of the most experienced editors and writers in the picture play field. It is just what we have been asserting for a year past, and it is the truth. Save your money!

Another Next Week

Next week we shall publish a strong and convincing statement from Editor Horace Vinton on the correspondence schools for script writers. Like Mr. Hoadley, Editor Vinton will write from years of experience. He has served the Shamrock, American, Comet and other companies as editor, script writer and director, and knows whereof he speaks.

Using the Daily Newspapers

A New York "institute," denied the advertising columns of several widely circulated moving picture trade journals, such as the Moving Picture News, is using extensive newspaper advertising in the West and Southwest. We have received half a dozen newspapers from writers in various parts of the country, with the advertisement marked. Here are some assertions contained in the advertisement:

> Positively no experience or literary excellence necessary. Manufacturers are offering $100 and more for single scenarios or written ideas.
> We have received many letters from the big film manufacturers, such as Vitagraph, Edison, Essanay, Lubin, Solax, Imp, Rex, Reliance, etc., urging us to send photoplays to them.
> You will earn $100 monthly for spare time work.

The statements contained in this advertisement are misleading, to put it mildly. We do not believe that Vitagraph, Edison, Essanay, Lubin, etc., have sent many letters to this concern "urging" that picture plays be sent to them. The editors are having a difficult time as it is, to wade through bales of impossible "school turned" scripts, and it is just such advertisements that cause the editorial departments extra labor. Manufacturers are not offering $100 and more for "written ideas," and the positive statement that "you will earn $100 monthly for spare time work" is untrue. We are of the opinion that the Postoffice Department should ask for convincing proof as to this out-and-out assertion of this "institute."

Perseverance Conquers

That most popular American playwright, the late Clyde Fitch, toiled perseveringly for years without recognition. And yet the picture playwright who dashes off one or two manuscripts, sends them out, has them returned, emits a yell to high heaven that "discrimination is practised," or "writers are favored," or that his "plots are swiped." The history of those lean years for Clyde Fitch has been lost sight of in the glamor of his later successes. He persevered, did painstaking work, refused to become discouraged, and then fame and wealth came to him in an avalanche. The would-be picture playwright who carefully evolves his idea and laboriously works out his theme is likely to feel that he has at least made his plot explicit, with its motive discernible and its moral, if it has one, plain. If he is intelligent, he studies other good plays before he begins his work, and endeavors to master the fascinating mysteries of construction, the making of climaxes and the development of character. He may feel that his work lacks much that maturer years and added experience would give it, but he joys in the fact that his purpose is clear. One of the most horrible shocks likely in store for him when he sees his first story filmed is the radical changes, which, in the author's opinion, tumbles the entire edifice about his ears. And this is the first thing that directors invariably do with the work of new writers, and older ones, for that matter. That it is frequently a matter of habit with them is proven by the fact that ten suggestions of this sort as to strengthening the plot will differ in every particular. Many of the directors do not now have the license to cut and slash a plot after it leaves the editorial desk, and this custom will become rarer as time goes on. The day is coming when the director will be obliged to take the natural and consistent story and produce it, whether it "appeals to him" or not. However, the thing for the beginner to do is to persevere. Study the market, the demands of the various editors, and, above all, never say die!

Everybody Cannot Do It

Everybody cannot write picture plays, despite the assertions of "associations," "universities," etc., that they can. There are many intelligent and educated persons who cannot compose a long letter, just as there are many highly cultured persons in this broad world of ours who cannot tell a musical note. Who will deny that Theodore Roosevelt is a highly educated and broad-minded statesman? None but the "standpatters." Yet Roosevelt has publicly admitted that he knows when the "Star Spangled Banner" is played, and that is about all. He has no musical ear. Many others have no literary talent. To be a successful writer of scripts, one must possess a talent for writing, must possess imagination, and acquire the art of condensation. City editors of newspapers will tell you that maybe one "cub" reporter out of five tried out is encouraged to persevere. Many college graduates fail as newspaper writers because they are not cut out for journalism, can never learn the art of literary composition or of condensation, even if they possess the willingness to work hard. They just haven't the bent, that is all. And there are many today striving fruitlessly in the field of picture play writing who will never succeed, because they haven't the bent.

Long Have We Advocated It

We were among the very first to crusade for proper recognition of the script writer on films and posters and on all advertising matter. We read Editor A. H. Saunders' recent editorial with interest and are pleased to know that he thought the question worthy of argument. Credit to those whom credit is due. If a writer turns out a good original working script, he should have credit for his ability on film and poster. When the editor and director are obliged to re-work the script, retaining the original idea, all three should be properly exploited.

MADAM CAMILLA D'ALBERG IN PSYCHOLOGICAL PLAY

By M. I. MacDonald

Although Madam Camilla D'Alberg has been some three or four years in America, and has appeared in drama, pantomime, etc., on the legitimate stage as well as in moving pictures, it has not been the privilege of the writer to personally become acquainted with the remarkable work of this truly great actress before.

It was only a few nights ago, at a benefit affair given by the Mothers' Club of Public School 52, Inwood-on-Hudson, at the Alhambra Roof, in which Ruth Richmond, with the Richmond Players, presented Cora Maynard's psychological play entitled "The Watcher," that the privilege was given me to witness a demonstration of the dramatic talent with which Madam D'Alberg is endowed, and which has delighted more than one crowned head in Europe.

In the part of Felice Kent, the mis-married young woman in the play, Madam D'Alberg had her opportunity, or rather, like the true artist that she is, she converted a role which might, in the hands of a less talented actress, have been comparatively colorless, into a wonderful creation of subtlety and emotion—she laughed, she wept, she was indifferent to the unloved, and a whirlwind of passion toward the unreciprocating former lover. She wove into the part the embodiment of the unhappy mortal, mismated, and hopelessly in love with a former lover, whom she had scorned.

The psychological point on which the play hinged was the perpetual pressure in spirit of the mother of her husband, a beautiful being upon whose influence those nearest and dearest to her apparently revolved.

Filled with delight and atsonishment, I could not but marvel at the versatility and finish of the artist, and it is indeed surprising that moving picture manufacturers, who are so largely in need of finished emotional pantomime, have not long ere this captured Madame D'Alberg for a stock company lead. There are three-figure people working in stock for motion pictures today who have neither the versatility nor the finesse of this clever European artist.

DICK'S WIFE

By VIRGINIA WEST

(Adapted from Eclair Release)

"NO, sir, the young scamp cannot have a penny of my money unless he marries within three months after my death. I know I'll be gone in a few weeks; I don't need anybody to tell me that."

Mr. John Graham spoke as he lay propped up with pillows.

"Dick's galivanting around Europe now, but I reckon he'd come home quick enough if he knew I was about to go over. Well, let him come, but it won't do him any good if he doesn't get a wife."

All this was said to Bertram Gordon, Mr. Graham's lawyer, who sat by his bed.

"Where is your nephew?" he asked the sick man.

"Oh, I don't know. He's in Europe some place, but that's all I know. Dick's a good boy but irresponsible. What he needs is a wife, and I want that will fixed so he'll get one."

Mr. Gordon nodded.

"When Dick's mother died she told me to watch over her boy. Well, I have to go now, and I want to do the best I can for the young rascal. All he needs is to settle down."

When, two months later, the news of his uncle's death reached Dick Graham in an obscure corner of Europe, he hastened home by the first boat.

The cablegram had said: "Your uncle dead. Peculiar conditions of will. Come at once."

So Dick came, wondering all the way what the conditions were. He and his uncle had been good enough friends but their views were different and they didn't spend much time together.

Dick expected to receive some money at his uncle's death, but when he read: "To my nephew, Richard Graham, I bequeath my entire fortune——," he stopped short. Could it really be so? He read again to be sure.

"To my nephew, Richard Graham, I bequeath my entire fortune—provided he is married within three months from the day of my death. If he is not married within that time, then I leave my entire fortune to the United Charities Association."

Dick sat staring in front of him. What in the world was the sense of such a will? He didn't want to marry now. Besides, he didn't have anybody to marry.

"What's the meaning of this, Mr. Gordon?" he asked the lawyer.

"Just what you see," was the reply. "Your uncle thought you ought to be married so he made his will that way."

"But Uncle John has been dead nearly three months and I have known about this ridiculous will for only a few minutes. Why, if I want this money, I've got to find somebody to marry me in the next three days."

Dick was getting excited.

"I'm sorry, Mr. Graham," said the lawyer sympathetically, "but we could not find you any quicker. As far as the will is concerned, it is all right. Your uncle was perfectly rational and knew exactly what he was doing. I suggested that it wasn't quite fair but it had no effect. You see plainly, Mr. Graham," he continued after a pause, "you must see that there is nothing for you to do but as your uncle wished or to forfeit the money."

"It looks that way," said Dick dejectedly. Rising slowly he said: "Well, I'll think about it and let you know tomorrow what course I'll take."

Dick went to his rooms and sat brooding. What could a fellow do? How could he get married when he didn't have anybody to marry? He began thinking over his old sweethearts. Before he went abroad he always had one on hand. The affair was never very serious but they were nice girls and he might persuade one of them to marry him.

So Dick dressed himself carefully and about the middle of the afternoon started forth on his quest of a bride.

First he went to the home of Jane Lenard. She had been his favorite, so he thought he would try her first.

As he was about to ring the bell the door opened and a man he had never seen before came out onto the porch.

The man looked at Dick inquiringly. "Did you wish to see some one?" he asked.

"Perhaps the person I am looking for doesn't live here any more," said Dick. I have been away for some time. I was looking for Miss Jane Lenard."

The man smiled. "No, she doesn't live here any more, but she is visiting here now. I am her husband. Would you like to see her?"

"Why—a—not just now," Dick hastened to say. "I wanted to see her only for a moment and wasn't sure she lived here. "I am in a hurry just now and won't stop."

Well, that was one off the list, and the choicest one, too. A little downhearted, Dick left the house.

Just as he turned to the next corner, trying to decide which of several young women to select for the second attempt, he heard his name called. He turned and saw a smiling young woman crossing the street toward him.

"Do you know me?" she asked when she had reached him.

"You bet I do. I was just going to see you. I have something very important to tell you."

"That sounds delightfully mysterious. Do tell me."

"Well, you know I told you before I went away that I loved you and you said you were very fond of me but would not commit yourself then. I want you to think it over again and marry me to-morrow morning. My uncle left a will which says that I must be married by to-morrow evening or I lose his fortune. If you could arrange it by that time everything would be well."

"Well, really, you are very kind and your plans are very nice, but I see one obstacle in our way."

"What?"

"Oh, it's not so much but it might make a difference," said the girl teasingly. "You see, I'm married and my husband might not want to give me up."

"For heaven's sake, why didn't you tell me that in the first place. I've lost a lot of time for nothing. Excuse me." And away he went at top speed, leaving the girl staring after him.

"I'll not waste any more time," he declared to himself as he almost ran down the street. "I'll try Blanche Howard next."

As the minutes passed Dick grew more and more desperate. Suppose he couldn't find anybody to marry him? That was the thought which kept going over and over in his mind.

When he came to the Howard home he ran up the steps and hurriedly rang the bell. A maid opened the door.

"Is Miss Blanche married?" he demanded.

"Why—why—yes, sir," faltered the girl, feeling as though she were betraying a secret.

"All right. I thank you."

Dick was at the bottom of the steps before the girl could get her breath.

"Poor young man," she said sadly as she closed the door.

"This is too slow," said Dick almost in a panic, "I'll telephone."

So unto a booth he went and began the round of the remainder of his old girl friends. One he could not reach, one was out of the city, and the rest were married.

Dick hung up the receiver for the last time with a look of despair. Slowly he left the booth and as slowly boarded a car for home.

As he sat in the car, letting his eyes roam idly from one thing to another, he suddenly caught his breath. On the back of another man's paper his eyes gazed upon a column of "wanted" advertisements. They clung there as a drowning man to a straw. Over and over in his mind the thought was repeating itself, "Why shouldn't I advertise?"

But what sort of a creature might answer? That was the trouble.

Then his mind became calmer and his thoughts came with clearness. A legal ceremony was all that was necessary to fulfil the requirements of the will. The money came to his uncle through Dick's grandfather and he felt perfectly justified in keeping it in the family in any way he could.

Yes, he knew that he had found a way—that is, if anyone answered the advertisement.

When he reached his rooms he set to work. In a short time he was on his way to a newspaper office with the following advertisement:

"Wanted: A young woman who will, for five hundred dollars, marry a young man of good family and leave him immediately after the ceremony."

That night Dick did not sleep. If no one answered, what could he do? He should lose the money unless a miracle happened. Thoughts innumerable went through his mind; thoughts of the past and of the future. What would he do if—and what would he do if not?

The next morning when Dick had scarcely finished an early breakfast a visitor was announced. His heart beat rapidly. A slender, girlish figure stood before him as he entered the parlor, but he could not tell what she looked like for she wore a heavy dark veil.

"She wants to be disguised, does she?" thought Dick. "All right, let her, I don't care. I'm glad I've got a beard, I'll shave it off as soon as she's out of my sight."

"Do you wish to earn the five hundred dollars I offered?" asked Dick in the most businesslike voice he could command.

"Yes," was the low reply.

"You realize what it means, do you? You will not have a husband and yet you will not be able to marry again."

"Yes, I understand perfectly."

"All right, come along and we'll go to the first minister we come to. I'm in a hurry. I've got to have a wife or I lose a fortune. By the way, what's your name? The minister will have to know."

"Mary Smith."

Dick grinned and said, "Mine is William Jones."

In the next block they found an Episcopal minister. He was free at that moment and would marry them at once, he said:

In the middle of the ceremony the minister put out his hand and Dick suddenly realized that he wanted a ring. He had nothing but one which had belonged to his mother. In desperation, hoping against hope that he would be able to get it back, he took it off and handed it to the minister.

Dick paid the marriage fee and the minister filled out the certificate.

"Here is the money. Thank you a thousand times," Dick said when they had reached the street. "Now, there is one other favor I want to ask of you. If you don't mind——"

"Hello, Dick! When did you get back?" called a voice from an approaching automobile. He turned for a moment to see who it was, and in that moment Mary Smith slipped away.

Dick felt very sorry about the ring but he was so relieved that he was married that he didn't have time to grieve much.

He went straight to the office of Mr. Gordon and threw the marriage certificate onto the table.

"There," he cried, "that is the proof of my marriage. Now I'm going to some remote spot in the mountains and try to forget the nightmare of the last three days."

Dick shaved his beard and went to the mountains the very next day. The season was drawing to a close and there were very few guests at the hotels and cottages. There were no young women at the place Dick boarded and he was well pleased. He felt as though he never wanted to see another one.

After he had been there a week the autumn beauty and the invigorating air made Dick change his mood to some extent.

So when Grace Lenox arrived with her sick mother the young man thought he could tolerate the girl's presence.

Who could help getting acquainted quickly, when the leaves are red and yellow, dozens and dozens of shades, and the air is crisp and the nuts are dropping?

The days passed and more of the people at the hotel left, until Grace and her mother and Dick were almost the only ones there.

Dick was always solicitous of Mrs. Lenox, helping her up and down stairs and bringing a chair to the sunny side of the porch, and all such attentions. This threw him and Grace together a great deal.

Dick soon found himself watching for her coming, but the girl seemed reserved beyond her years, and even seemed to avoid him, if possible. And yet she was friendly.

The days before he came to the mountains seemed to be so far in the past that Dick seldom gave them a thought. He was enjoying the present, until, one night, he stood under the bright stars beside Grace Lenox. Then, in a flash he realized that he loved this girl and that he had cut himself off from her. Well, there was nothing to do but to leave her now. He would go on the first train in the morning.

"I am leaving to-morrow," he said in a low voice.

Grace turned to him quickly for a moment, then away again. "I am sorry," she said, "We shall miss you, mother and I."

"You shall miss me?"

"Yes."

Dick crushed some dry leaves between his hands. "I have been so happy in your friendship. I have—I do, value it more than I can tell you."

"Thank you."

"There is something I should like to tell you but I have no right to."

"No right?"

"No."

"Perhaps I know."

"Do you?" he asked, taking her hand in his.

She faced him frankly.

"Yes," she said, "I do know and I have no more right to listen than you have to tell me."

"You? No right?"

"No. I am married."

"And I. Oh, I should have told you in the beginning if I had dreamed that you would care for me."

"Of course you could not know. I tried to avoid you."

"I want you to believe this, Grace; I am being unfaithful to no one by telling of my love for you. I am nothing to the woman who bears my name."

"I do believe you."

"Then let us say good-bye now and I shall go in the morning. Kiss me, dear."

"No, no, I cannot; I dare not."

She drew her hands from the firm clasp of Dick with such force that a ring was drawn from her finger and dropped to the ground.

"Never mind, let it go," she told Dick, but he insisted that he would find it in the morning.

They parted in silence and went to their rooms.

The next morning, shortly after daylight, Dick was searching for the ring.

Suddenly he gave a start and stood staring as one who had seen a ghost.

He heard a rustle in the leaves behind him and turned to see Grace walking along the path. He called to her in a voice that made her come to him instantly.

"Is this the ring you lost last night?" he almost demanded.

She nodded.

"Are you Mary Smith?"

"Yes. How did you know? Did you—are you—Oh, you can't be William Jones!"

"My darling, I am," said Dick as he took Grace in his arms. "Think of the wonder of it, we are married to each other."

They stood in silence, each busy with his own thoughts.

Finally Dick said: "Tell me, dear, why did you do such a thing as to answer that advertisement?"

Because mother was very sick and needed to go away. I had to have the money. Of course, she knows nothing about it."

"I wish I'd made it five thousand," Dick exclaimed vehemently.

"I don't," said Grace, "for then I should have taken mother to Europe and might never have met you."

PICTURE MUSIC

By ERNST LUZ

When the time arrives that the good picture musician will be classed according to his repertoire of music and every musician will have classified his repertoire or library according to the temperamental requirements of the picture, and not according to titles, then it will be possible to in part at least give appreciated musical portrayals to pictures with musical combinations or small orchestras of proper instrumentation.

The larger orchestra will only be a success after a plot system has been adopted or proper scores are furnished. There are many picture theatres at present using combinations or orchestras that meet with fair success, for they at least with much care are able to refrain from playing that which is injurious to the picture. The picture in its silent portrayals affords excellent opportunities for string combinations, stringed instruments being more effective for playing the greater portion of all pictures. I would suggest that combinations be of following instrumentation, viz.: 1. Piano. 2. Violin. 3. Cello. 4. Clarinet 5. Violin. 6. Cornet. 7. Flute. 8. Bass. 9. Drums. 10. Trombone. It is hardly possible for any combination to play through the entire picture, giving proper portrayals, under present conditions, yet by observing some of the following rules some effects that would be much appreciated could be obtained.

It is first necessary that the leader be a pianist familiar with picture playing and acquainted with the temperamental value of his repertoire. For each drama or melodrama of modern subject have a waltz, 2-4 and 6-8 march, caprice; pathetic and sentimental descriptive number ready on stand. As the picture progresses, and having previously read the story, you will find no difficulty in placing three or four of these numbers. The piano necessarily must be the pivot connecting these numbers and will consequently be playing alone at times. For comedies have a setup of popular song numbers in two-step form and consecutive keys, also medley waltzes or 4-4 movements. Medley selections containing slow movements are neither practical nor appropriate. These numbers will do for the greater portion of all comedies. Where burlesque dramatic situations occur it would again be necessary for the pianist to play them, falling back to your medley after the action. For historical court dramas have a processional or grand march, two allegretto numbers of even tempo for neutral playing, gavotte, plaintive of Tschaikowsky style or dirge, and two Valse Lentos not ballet numbers. For other pictures of ancient classics or poems, unless they are characteristic, have sweet melodious numbers of even tempo and neutral temperament at hand. If the story would show that there is any court action or that knights or nobles are cast it is well to have a gavotte and grand march ready. For Westerns the light and heavy march, galop, waltz and pathetic, together with the dramatic hurry, covers all that is likely to occur. There will be exceptions and therein lies the duties of the piano, for until it is possible to make a correct setup of music prior to the projection of the picture the pianist will need be a genius with broad shoulders to bear some blame. The instrumentation for picture playing I suggest requires no catering to in the matter of repertoire, for the instruments suggested are important in all musical arrangements and it should be a known fact that you cannot cater to a drum in playing good music. If the picture is to educate and morally elevate the public, it is destined to create deep thought, and the drum or any other noisy instrument will destroy thought. The picture is a quiet affair and while it portrays action which gives a tumultuous impression it does not necessarily mean that brass or drums are required, for these effects are created by your PP or FF contrasts.

The greater portion of all pictures, excepting Westerns, calls for quiet effects of the chamber or parlor music order and therein will be the picture music's greatest possible success, for in that respect it will differ materially with other theatrical entertainments and be a much-appreciated improvement in theatre music.

There is not one iota of doubt that the picture can be the greatest medium for bringing to the public the best of music in a way that it will be appreciated and thereby musically educate the American public, not only create opportunities for our American talent, but also lay the foundation which will assure such talent its deserved appreciation as a reward for their tedious study in attaining their musical accomplishments.

In the musical plots of this week's issue there are setups for two features and one release of C. G. P. C. based on stories of ancient nobility and court life.

With a view of helping you in your musical portrayal of such pictures I will give a few useful explanations. You will note that I use the term "same as No. 1," etc., which does not necessarily mean that the same number must be played (although it would be better from a musical point of view to do so), but it means that the number portrays action of the same character or similar with a like staging and might be called a theme for that certain character. To illustrate you will find that in pictures of court life there is a certain court etiquette adhered to by the director of the picture and when the king makes an entrance, exit or is on the screen at opening of scene he is usually attended by his guard or advisers. This gives a heavy sameness to his action, for which reason most composers have written their music for king accompaniments in moderato 4-4 tempo or grand march style.

You will find it effective to follow such a character with this tempo. The leading female character usually takes two moods, one romantic, the other plaintive. Use a Valse Lento in major key and legato for the romantic and an Andante movement in minor key for the plaintive, and follow the character with these as themes.

By using such themes in pictures of this kind you will need only place one or two neutral numbers to effectively play a multiple reel feature.

MUSICAL PLOTS

By Ernst Luz.

A few rules governing their use.

The cues given will allow for natural ending of strains, unless "Leader" cue, in which case a quick segue should be made unless otherwise stated. Avoid Overtures and Potpourris in their entirety; each picture creates its own selection or potpourri. The cues are so stated as to give you both a prompt and direct cue. You are safe in making segue as soon as you are positive of your prompt cue. Avoid introductions to numbers unless otherwise stated. Avoid the shading of numbers as printed, an even mezzo forte being the best. From this you can get both pp and ff shadings with effect according to the demands of picture action. When shading is positively essential you will find words "Tone to action." Avoid the use of books. They are not practical for setting-up. In playing numbers following a certain line of action drop to pp in case there is a cut-in of flash scenes. For playing recopy plots legibly on large paper and fasten by clasp to right of music stand or piano. Read the Film Stories in this magazine as it will familiarize you with the cues. Studio projection would allow for material improvement in setups. We are always ready to hear from you and explain any difficulties you may have with these plots or otherwise. If personal reply is requested enclose stamped envelope.

MANUFACTURERS' NOTES.

Mr. S. S. Hutchinson, president of the American Film Mfg. Co., who has been on the Coast for the past month, has engaged an additional company to operate at that point. It is believed that the increased operations at the coast studios will mean that Warren J. Kerrigan, the handsome leading man, will be seen in other than Western plays During the past two years Mr. Kerrigan has only appeared in the wild and woolly West plays. Mr. Hutchinson spent considerable time in Los Angeles and it is understood that plans are being perfected for the erection of large laboratories and granite and glass studios.

The prospect of securing a permanent site in Santa Barbara is considered excellent by the citizens as well as the American Company.

Mr. William J. Bauman, one of the producers at the Chicago studio, and Mr. Omer F. Doud, editor-in-chief of the scenario department, have been transferred to the Coast. The future plans of the company are closely guarded, but from the activities encountered, both at Chicago and Santa Barbara, it is evident that "something big will soon be pulled off."

Forrest Halsey was given a dinner by Manager Ritchey, of Reliance, and his staff of directors and scenario editors at Cavanaugh's on Tuesday evening. The Reliance release of November 27th, 'Thanksgiving," of which Mr. Halsey is the author, was shown upon the screen and the dinner followed.

Liebler & Company will produce Mr. Halsey's new play "Liquor" at an early date.

Herbert Rice, the leading man for "Punch," is so small that Director Western stands him on a chair so that he can talk to him without getting a cramp in his neck. In spite of his size Mr. Rice is a very clever actor, playing character roles as well as straight. But he excels in child parts, having starred for several seasons in "Buster Brown." "Punch" will release one comedy split reel a week, beginning Thursday, December 5th.

On Monday, November 11, a party of men, well known in film circles from various points of the United States, met at the Chicago office of the Mutual Film Corporation. A trip was taken in the big new touring car of the American Film Co. to the "Flying A" Motion Picture plant. The inspection of the plant proved of great interest and the facilities for producing good "Flying A" pictures were highly approved.

The party consisted of Dr. Schallenbarger of Chicago, Mr. Mandlebaum of Cleveland, Mr. Bracken from everywhere, Mr. Gregory from New York, en route to California, Mr. Freuler, General Manager of the Mutual Film Corporation, and Mr. Nehls, Manager of the American Film Mfg. Co.

Siegmund Lubin, the picture play manufacturer, sailed Tuesday, November 19, on the Kronprinz Wilhelm, North German Lloyd Steamship Line, for Berlin, Germany. The trip is partly a reunion and probably business observations as the producer is anxious to establish a plant in the German capital. Mr. Lubin will be accompanied by his wife, two daughters and two grandchildren. On the return trip the party wil visit Paris and London.

The Baltimore News has made somewhat of a departure from the usual newspaper tactics by placing on opposite pages the general news, criticisms and advertising of the moving pictures and that of the legitimate stage.

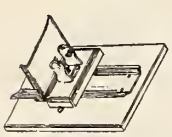
This is just another evidence of the rapidity with which the animated picture is gaining ground in dignity and appreciation.

INNOVATIVE

Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Especially for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City

In the Patent Office the tendency is to prevent, as far as possible, the wilful prolongation of applications for patent, although in most cases the delay rests with the office owing to lack of facilities. To this end an amendment to the law has been proposed to Congress by the Commissioner changing the limitation of time for responsive actions on the part of an applicant to six months after any action by the Patent Office. The present period in which an applicant is allowed to amend is one year, and under the existing practice there have been many instances of cases being amended just within the one-year limit in order to keep them alive, they thus serving as dragnets in many instances to catch inventions along similar lines which may be subsequently applied for, thereby involving inventors in expensive interference proceedings. It has been the policy of the present administration to get all cases out of the Office as soon as possible consistent with good work. Nevertheless the Office has been severely criticised of late for allowing applications, particularly those owned by corporations, to rest in the Office for such long periods as really to have the effect of extending the patent period when such applications are actually passed to issue. The proposed new rule would be very effective in preventing undue procrastination by applicants and attorneys.

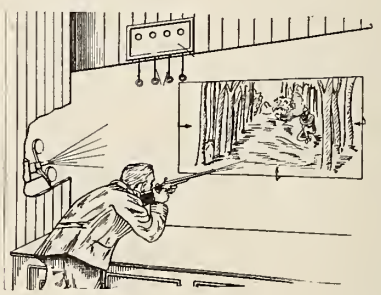
Registration has been granted the American Film Manufacturing Co., of Chicago, Ill., for its "flying wings" trade-mark, used since September 1, 1910, no claim being made to the letter "A" in the abstract.



Patent No. 1,042,023, issued to the Gundlach-Manhattan Optical Company, of Rochester, N. Y., a corporation of New York, as assignee of the inventor, Charles Miller, of Rochester, N. Y., is for a clamping device for lens holders, the device being intended to clamp the lens holder at any point to the run-way or guide such as is usually carried on the hinged front of the ordinary hand camera, permitting easy adjustment and accurate focusing of the lens. The device comprises, in conjunction with a camera, the combination of a base supporting a lens front, a guide along which said base is adapted to travel, means for clamping said base adjustably on said guide, said means comprising a pair of runners, one engaging on each side of said guide, and a spring embracing the outside of said runners and pressing them toward each other and against the guide.

Photographs of the lunar surface taken recently by Professor Wood by three different methods would indicate the future possibilities and uses of the art as applied to celestial objects, the innovation consisting in the use of the visual region of the spectrum alone, the violet region alone, and the ultra violet region alone. Thus a patch just above the crater Aristarchus as bright as the surrounding surface when the "visual" region is employed develops rather dark when photographed in the "ultra-violet" light. Some of the maria appear darker in the violet picture and appear to be differently interset by the selective process.

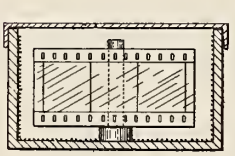
The Professor suggests that, were it possible to take pictures over a great range of different wave-lengths, the subject, for instance, of lunar petrography might be investigated with more or less success. Thus a series of experiments led him to the conclusion that the dark patch near Aristarchus is covered by a form of sulphur or some compound thereof. If it were possible to extend the range of photography to where the silicates begin to show by anomalies in reflecting power, one might be able to map out the lunar surface petrographically. Twenty centuries ago the old Greek astronomer, Aristarchus, speculated on the magnitude and distance of the moon. What would he have thought of a proposition to analyze its composition.



The utilization of the animated picture for target practice is the object of Letters Patent No. 1,035,811 issued to an Englishman, James Paterson, residing at Kensington, London. The accompanying illustration represents the firing counter, the projector, and a paper or similar perforable screen upon which is thrown, for instance, a kinematographic picture of a scout whose fire the marksman is supposed to be returning. As the film is unwound the scout appears to advance and retreat, representing differences of range of from say 100 to 500 yards. A metal target behind the screen of approximate form to that of the moving figure in the picture is caused to move synchronously therewith, and is in electrical communication with the indicator, so that if the moving figure is "hit" the shot will be recorded automatically. The target is so mounted that an attendant can manipulate it to suit requirements by keeping the marginal pointers in line with the moving figure. As the screen is the only thing to suffer, it is obvious that the marksman may maliciously "pot" his shadowy and elusive enemy many times with impunity in a single encounter if he has the requisite skill.

The Universal Film Manufacturing Co., of New York City, has applied for the registration of the adjoining trade-mark for moving picture negative and positive films, claiming use since February, 1912.

more plagiarism. In the case of the Kalem Co. v. Harper Bros. (32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 20 U. S. S. C.) the Supreme Court of the United States holds that moving picture films are an infringement of copyright when dramatized from a book so protected, even though the scenario represents only portions of the book, provided the adaptation clearly identifies the story.



In Letters Patent No. 1,042,801 issued to Isidor Kitsee, of Philadelphia, Pa., it is set forth that the frequent occurrence of explosions of stored celluloid films is not due to the direct contact of a spark therewith, but to the elevation of the temperature of the enclosed air by impregnation with the gaseous emanations from the composition of the films. The inventor says that he has found that if a nitrated material is embedded in a carbonate compound, the gases given off by said material are neutralized, the temperature remains stationary, and no deterioration is ascertainable. Hence he provides a container for the storage of films with an agent for neutralizing the gases emanating therefrom—bi-carbonate of soda being the agent particularly specified. The accompanying illustration represents a receptacle lined with the neutralizer, the film being mounted on a support, to avoid contact with said neutralizer.

In Letters Patent No. 1,042,856, issued to Ansel Wallace, of Evansville, Ind., it is sought to obviate the difficulty of securing a flashlight exposure of subjects in motion, owing to the necessity for igniting the powder at an instant determined by means of the finder. With set pictures this difficulty is not present, but when snap shots are to be relied upon, particularly as in newspaper work, where the subject is frequently unaware of the taking of the picture, this difficulty has heretofore been insurmountable. Hence, the main object of the invention is to provide a flashlight apparatus of this character wherein the means controlling the electric circuit may be mounted upon the camera and will be under the control of the shutter releasing mechanism in order to secure the proper timing of the ignition of the charge of powder as related to the exposure. The accompanying view represents a side elevation of a focal plane shutter camera embodying the invention, a portion thereof being broken away to disclose the batteries and flash pan mount. The device embodies a flash pan, a shutter trip mechanism, an electrical circuit including therein electrical terminals carried by said flash pan, an oscillatory lever adapted to actuate said trip mechanism, and an electrical contact adjacent to said lever and adapted to be engaged thereby, whereby said lever will engage said contact, close said circuit, and actuate said shutter trip mechanism.

MUSIC is an important accessory to artistic scenario films at all times, and even subordinates the motion picture in some cases and places, as in London, where, at the Scala Theatre, the "Autophoto-Opera" is an accomplished fact. Kinemacolor films of Gounod's "Faust" are there being projected to the accompaniment of an augmented orchestra, which plays the operatic score in as near its entirety as is customary in the "legitimate" performances of the opera in France. Theatre-goers are taking to the innovation, as evidenced by the presence of large audiences.

In re Newman, O. G. 183 p. 220 Assistant Commissioner of Patents Tennant held that while the assignee of an entire interest in an application for patent may be permitted to prosecute such application to the exclusion of the inventor, the Patent Office cannot recognize a party having only an option to purchase.

An innovation has been made in the new Theatorium at Evansville, Ind. The ceiling is 24 feet above a flat floor, and hence the pictures can be projected so high above the heads of the audience that all can see, even when the women do NOT remove their hats, and that means considerable altitude these days. This is catering to feminine vanity and comfort with a vengeance. How about "equal rights" for the poor masculine? What is sauce for the goose ought to be sauce for the gander.

In the Patent Office it is believed to be against public policy to encourage the use of the names of ex-Presidents by allowing them to be registered as trade-marks, Commissioner of Patents Moore having refused some years ago to register the name of ex-President Grover Cleveland as a trade-mark upon the ground that such use would tend to detract from the dignity of the office once held.

OLD Nick alone seems to be responsible for some of the legal complications that arise. For instance, either tragic rivalry or a struggle between Ego and Subconsciousness, is suggested by the title of the suit, Romeo v. Romeo, (31 New York Supplement 1141). "The weakest goes to the wall" Scenario 1, Act 1, Romeo and Juliet.

Medieval Strife is further suggested by Archer v. Archer, (132 New York Supplement 130); but genuine modern cussedness is implied in the title of a divorce proceeding in 145 Southwestern Reporter 682, to wit, Shook v. Shook, in which Carrie B. segregated J. O.'s personality, but affiliated with the involved property. J. O.'s legal flirtation with the latter is recorded at page 699, same volume.

In view of the above citations it is hardly necessary to refer to "In re Streiff" (119 Wisconsin, 566, 97, Northwestern Reporter, 189) in proof of the fact that this is truly a world of trouble and strife—from a lawyer's gratifying point of view at least.

We shall be pleased to answer pertinent questions propounded by readers of the Moving Picture News.

OPERATORS' CHAT

By Ralph Knaster

The Moving Picture Machine Operators Union No. 1 of N. Y. will hold their next regular meeting on Monday, December 2, 1912, at Teutonia Hall, No. 66 Essex street, New York, at twelve o'clock, midnight.

All members are requested to be present, as there are many important things that will be placed before them for their approval, also quite some news from Rochester convention of A. F. L.

No doubt all the operators by this time are well familiar with trickery and mean tactics tbat have been used against the Moving Picture Operators Union of New York, Local No. 1, by the Spot Light Union No. 35, and witb all their contemptible trials they have never succeeded in their undertakings.

The only time all was bliss for tbe Spot Light Union No. 35 was when tbey were a mother local to what is now known as the Operators Union No. 1, and they did have happiness for five long years and the ex-auxiliary had that many years of misery. Tbose five years which Local No. 35 enjoyed tbey must now pay for dearly, for the old saying is a mighty true and good one.

"As ye sow, so shall ye reap."

The unfortunate Spot Light Local No. 35 had been sowing bad seeds for many year, and now it is impossible for them to reap a good harvest.

"Wbat have they gained?" Only enmity.

The proprietors of moving picture theatres know that tbey cannot get a good picture operator from the Spot Light Union, and consequently they seek good operators from the office of the Moving Picture Operators Union No. 1, as it is well understood tbat a man witb too many trades does not understand one trade thoroughly. A Spot Light operator is by no means a perfect moving picture operator, and it does not require an expert to throw a spot on the stage, so therefore a spot light operator only receives $1.50 for a performance. To be a picture operator you must know quite a bit more, have more brains, and must convince the city department tbat you are an A-1 man before you are granted a license to be a moving picture operator, and tben your certificate does not prove your ability to throw a good picture. But when you hold a No. 1 union card or certificate, tbat proves your ability that you can throw a good picture, for you must prove that before you get that union card. So it is much better to know one trade and know it thoroughly and belong to a union that demands men of one trade to unite under a cbarter that will not conflict with anotber trade so that you may be sure of the job you are working on, and that another man cannot come along and say tbat he belongs to tbe same union and can run two jobs of two different crafts for the one salary.

The writer was visiting a new theatre which was under construction and heard a man ask the manager to give him a job as operator when the place was ready to open up. The manager asked him, "Are you a good operator?" Naturally the man said sure! I belong to Local No. 35; herc is my card. "Oh," said the manager, "I don't think I want you, you are a Spot Light man. No, I don't want that. I don't want a man that knows too much or too many things, for you will soon know how to run my job and then you will run the whole thing here; I want a good operator for pictures so you may go." That is one example for tbe fellow that knows it all.

A little advice to the picture operator that is seeking the opportunity to join a good union that gives representation for taxation, and does not compel you to pay an application fee that will make you work a month to get the money to pay and don't care if you have enough to live on or wbether you starve as long as you pay them an outrageous entrance fee. I advise all operators to join the Moving Picture Operators Union No. 1 of Greater New York. Application fee is $5.00 and the dues 50 cents per month; for this you receive all protection and if you are not working we have an employment office where you will not have to wait long to get a good position, as there is plenty of work for good men that really want and need work.

Applications can be made at the office of the union, 133 Third avenue, near Fourteenth street, New York City, between the hours of 10 A. M. and 2 P. M. daily. Our employment office is open from 9:30 A. M. to 5:30 P. M. daily.

A BIG TIME SOON AT HAND

The entertainment and ball of the Moving Picture Operators Union No. 1 of New York will take place on Monday, February 10, 1913, at Palm Garden, Fifty-eigbth street and Lexington avenue.

All the leading stars of the firmament will appear at tbis affair and it surely will be a grand success, as the arranging of this season's event is in the hands of a competent committee.

Boys, you can't afford to miss this big night; keep it in mind and pass the good word along.

* * * *

Miss Pearl White, leading lady of the Crystal Film Company, and Mr. Wm. Garwood, the leading man for the Thanhouser Company, are going to lead the grand march, and they have given this in writing to the business representative of Local No. 1 to show their friendship toward the men that project their pictures upon the screen daily, and they promised that there isn't anything that can get tbem to disappoint us; even if their houses should cave, they will crawl out and welcome the boys at Palm Garden on February 10, 1913.

AMERICAN

THE LAW OF GOD (Dec. 9).—All his life had been a disappointment to Jim Gleason and he had come to look upon his fellowmen with distrust, and in his morbidness he even denied the existence of a Supreme Being. In the course of his wanderings he had come to Montecito, where Vera Bradley, the young and innocent daughter of the minister, attracted his fancy.

In her innocence she confides in her father and he, with the welfare of his daughter at heart, consulted the young man as to his religious beliefs and is horrified to learn that he is an atheist. As a result he refuses to allow his daughter to see more of the young man. The following Sunday a wandering cripple stops at the church and endeavors to sell small religious pamphlets. The minister examines them and, finding the Ten Commandments and other religious quotations in the book, procures a copy and urges the congregation to do the same.

Vera gets a copy and, meeting Jim Gleason, she shows him the book and is so horrified at his blasphemous remarks that she refuses to see or hear from him again.

Disappointed in love, distrustful of his fellowmen, and unhappy, Jim Gleason falls in with the lawless element of the town and becomes a great crony of the leader, Bud Black. They meet in a saloon where many schemes of petty peccadillos are hatched and floated. But one day Bud Black plans on a crime of larger dimensions. If he can get Jim to throw the derailing switch outside the town at the railroad's yard limit they could wreck the Sunset Limited and secure a large booty. He is explaining his plan to Jim when the wandering cripple enters the saloon selling his pamphlets. He is turned down by the hartender and the crowd, but Bud, in order to be rid of his presence, purchases a copy and, tearing out a leaf, draws thereon a plan for the benefit of Jim. Jim agrees to do his part in the project and goes out to look the ground over. In Bud Black's gang one member, who has always been timid, in thinking over the magnitude of the proposed crime, began to fear for his safety and determined to notify the sheriff. So it was that when Jim arrived at the scene of action his every movement was watched by Bud Black and his gang to make sure of no weakening and the sheriff and posse were on the way to surprise the outlaws and save the train.

In waiting for the train Jim consulted his plans and then, having fixed them in his mind, turned over the page and found "THE LAW OF GOD." And in the Holy Writ he finds "THOU SHALT NOT STEAL." And a version of Vera's horrified face comes to him as she looked when he uttered his remarks about the pamphlet. "THOU SHALT NOT KILL." In his ears he hears the sound of grinding brakes, hissing steam, the agonized cries of the injured and dying brought to eternity by his crime. Vera's face appears looking upon him in horror and his hand is stayed. He starts away just as the Limited goes shrieking by. Bud Black and his gang watch for the expected wreck and in their anger at the failure of their plan they decide to wreck vengeance upon Jim. They start in pursuit of the fleeing man, and thundering at their own heels is the sheriff's posse. Bud Black is soon within shooting distance of the intended victim, his gun barks and Jim falls in the dust. But now, appraised that the posse is after him, he rides with his gang for his own liberty. They are soon captured and the posse start on the return trip. Picking up the wounded man they return to town, where Jim is left to the tender mercy of the Rev. Bradley and his daughter. When Jim sees Vera his face lights up and, extending his hand, he places in hers the bloodstained "LAW OF GOD." And when Jim is able to be out again he visits the church as the accepted suitor of the minister's daughter, for he has "come into the light."

NELL OF THE PAMPAS (Dec. 12).—Down among the pampas growers Nell, the young and beautiful daughter of old Pedro Villiar, has many suitors. No matter where she goes among her father's men she is always welcomed and worshipped. In the kindness of her heart she has been generous to an orphan idiot who lives off her father's bounty, and she becomes the idol of his eye, and he follows her like a faithful dog. Among all her suitors Juan Cardoza is the favored one. Big and manly, he has inspired her love, and they have reached an understanding. But Juan's personality has unwittingly aroused the affections of another woman, a half-breed, who desired to win him. She watches the lovers with jealous eyes and one day, seeing Juan giving Nell a bracelet of silver, she waits until he leaves Nell and, when he passes her, she throws herself into his arms and implores his love. All this is witnessed by Nell and, sick at heart, she throws the trinket away and starts home. Juan renounces the woman, but the harm is done. En route to her home Nell encounters a stranger and takes him with her, and he engages board with her parents. But Jim Beverly soon shows his true colors, abusing the poor idiot, thus securing the enmity and lording it over the simple pampas growers. He overreaches himself when he insults Nell. Juan sees the attempt and gives him a trouncing. Smarting for revenge he plots with the half-breed woman to kidnap Nell, thus securing her and leaving Juan for the half-breed. Watching his opportunity, Beverly sees Nell leaving her home one evening for her accustomed stroll in the pampas field and, getting his horse, follows her and is in turn followed by the idiot. Juan starts out in hope of seeing Nell and is followed by the half-breed woman. Jim sees Juan coming and, raising his gun, attempts to kill him, but the half-breed, anticipating the treacherous act, springs in front of him and receives the bullet in her own breast, giving her life for her love. Jim hurries back to his horse and finds the vindictive idiot waiting for him. In the fight that follows both are mortally wounded. Nell, startled by the sounds of shooting in the night air, hurries in the direction of the sound to find Juan kneeling over the body of the woman. All is explained and the lovers are reunited.

ECLIPSE—GEORGE KLEINE

WRONGLY ACCUSED (Dec. 14).—Horder, the head gamekeeper, overtakes a peasant named Rowden poaching upon the preserves. He is about to collar the fellow when the peasant's gun accidentally goes off, wounding the gamekeeper in the face. When his assistants arrive upon the scene Horder, because of a former grudge, declares that the poacher deliberately shot at him. The result is that Rowden is sent to jail for a long period.

In order to support herself and her little son, Martha, the unfortunate wife, is forced to take a position as lady's maid at the castle.

Five years later Rowden is liberated and, learning the whereabouts of his wife, enters the house through an open window. Hardly have husband and wife embraced before the servants, who have heard queer noises, give the alarm.

Rowden escapes but later returns to the house, where he finds Horder, the gamekeeper, in the hall, taking instructions from the master of the house. Rowden confronts him and forces Horder to confess that he falsely accused him of the shooting.

The squire is highly indignant at the story of the injustice, and offers the peasant a position upon his estate; after which husband and wife are happily reunited with their little son.

CINES—GEORGE KLEINE

UP AGAINST IT (Dec. 3).—Fred is a very susceptible young man who cannot resist the sight of a pretty face. One day, seeing a charming young lady enter a hansom, he immediately jumps into a taxi, directing the driver to follow her. The lady's coachman gives him the slip, however, and his dismay is increased when he discovers that he has no money to pay his driver, forcing him to continue his journey in a series of attempts to raise funds.

He tries to borrow from his hall porter, various friends, and finally tackles his uncle, but the latter only makes the situation worse by insisting that Fred stay to lunch while the taximeter keeps mounting up the charges.

Finally the poor fellow calls upon his lawyer, who refuses to lend him any money, but, being on his way to court, agrees to have a ride in the taxi. At a convenient moment, however, Fred decides that he has ridden long enough and jumps out of the vehicle, leaving the astonished lawyer to settle the charges, which have amounted to a considerable sum.

GAUMONT

THE MATRIMONIAL EXPRESS (Dec. 3).—A decidedly handsome lady of the blonde persuasion with a feminine companion whose looks are hardly so inviting find themselves in the same railroad car with Andrew Forbes. Mr. Forbes thereupon enters into a desperate flirtation with the blonde lady which is equally desperately received, the desperation being mostly caused by the argus-eyed companion, who seems to take diaholical pleasure in thwarting their attempts at intimacy. There is a very ingenious courtship carried on through transoms and in the dining car, and especially noteworthy are the feet to promote acquaintance. Through the activities of their feet under the dining table there is a mix-up, however, in extremities, when our flirtatious hero gets his No. 9 AAs sadly mixed up with the common-sense lasts of the ogre-like companion. They reach a tunnel and Mr. Forbes, with an audacity quite commensurate with the worthiness of the cause, attempts to kiss the blonde lady. Tunnels have an unpleasant way of being dark, however, and he plants his affectionate peck on the unsympathetic lips of the companion, who is angry enough to bite him. The two ladies and Forbes get off at the same station but they are whisked out of sight in an automobile before he can trace them. Forbes then goes on to his destination, his uncle's suburban home. His uncle is importunate that Forbes becomes married and says that he has the lady all picked out for him, all dressed up like Astor's pet cow, and that to-day she will come for inspection. Forbes, making a very wry face at the idea of being sicked on to an unknown woman in this manner, as his thoughts are still occupied with the fair charmer of the express. It soon turns out to be the matrimonial express, however, as the very lady selected by his uncle for the lucrative position of his wife is the same as she with whom he had so desperately flirted on the train. They take the same express on their honeymoon.

PERILS OF THE ATLANTIC (Feature, 3 reels).—James Trevor, on the eve of departure for America to visit an agency, delays his passage on a transatlantic steamship because of a warning letter received from a friend advising him to postpone his departure because due to icebergs. Mrs. Trevor, at a friend's because of icebergs. Mrs. Trevor, at a friend's house, meets a palmist then being received by fashionable society. The palmist, for some inscrutable reason, refuses to employ her arts on the palm of Mrs. Trevor. She does, however, agree to an engagement. The prophecy Mrs. Trevor receives is a fearful one and, with sinking heart, the wife and mother hears that she is to lose one to her near and dear. Will it be my husband or my son, is the tremulous query which reverberates through her brain. Mr. Trevor, seeing an advertisement for the Colossus, the largest steamship in the world, which is just about to make her maiden trip, engages passage on her. The lonely wife, her mind disturbed by the palmist's prophecy, writes to her uncle, asking him to spend a few days with her to relieve her from her low spiritedness. The Colossus meets the fate of the Titanic, striking an iceberg in the night and sinking into the depths with the majority of her two thousand souls. While Mrs. Trevor and her uncle are at dinner there is brought a newspaper containing the first announcement of the fate of the Colossus. Strong is the grief of the mother, but stronger the grief of the child, whose health suffers under the poignancy of the melancholia. Meanwhile the survivors of the Colossus, among whom is James Trevor, have reached port and to his wife and child the husband flashes the joyous "All is well" telegram. With one terror relieved there is yet another potential grief seemingly in store for the mother. The palmist's prophecy yet haunts her and she fears that inasmuch as her husband has been snatched from the scythe of Death, the little son will be garnered in by the grim reaper. The obsession more and more possesses the feminine mind until wrinkles of anxiety come into her face and the light of an unknown terror into her eyes. Mr. Jullien, the uncle, a man of sound judgment and common sense, has little faith in the readings of the palmist and believes that a ruse will relieve the worries of the mother by proving to her that the palmist is a mere charlatan. The uncle accordingly writes to the palmist, asking her to come to the hotel for the purpose of reading the hand of his niece, a young woman about to be married. The palmist is somewhat surprised to see the room inhabited by a man and she looks about for the mentioned young woman. None is in sight, but through the curtains before a door leading to an adjoining room extends a white, graceful feminine hand. The palmist refuses to perform her reading under such conditions, but the uncle prevails upon her by the argument that inasmuch as she reads the palm, sight of the other parts of the individual are unnecessary. The moving argument, however, is the presentation of a large fee. The palmist, falling into the trap, accordingly makes a pretended reading of the mysterious hand and utterly contradicting all of her dark predictions of a few weeks previous, prognosticates the brightest prospects of great happiness and prosperity of the subject. Better by her own reading the mother, subject to such a mental strain, pushes aside the curtain and confronts the dismayed palmist. The uncle then gets into possession of a letter addressed to the palmist which more fully explains her nefarious business, the letter congratulating the palmist upon her use of the "apparent possession of supernatural foresight, which always attracts the many fools who in this trash believe." Her perfidy unmasked, the palmist is sent away discomfited while the relieved mother hastens back to her wounded dove. The father arrives and his presence acts as a tonic most efficacious and the child quickly rallies to bring joy again to the household over which the sword of Damocles was threateningly hung.

GREAT NORTHERN

QUEEN OF THE SEASON (Nov. 30).—This is a dainty comedy enacted at the seashore and is replete with action of the genuinely humorous sort. Mrs. Blanc is an attractive young matron who visits the seashore at the urgent request of her husband, while he remains at home to look after the little offspring of the couple. No sooner has she arrived at the Summer hotel than she becomes the center of attraction to the gallants, young and old, who are guests at the resort. Three in particular have constituted themselves her bodyguard and are most profuse in their polite attentions. Mrs. Blanc enters into the spirit of the lark and carries on a mild flirtation with each of the Romeos. Rivalry becomes so keen that fisticuffs are imminent, but Mrs. Blanc invariably smooths matters over and the fun recommences. In their desire to outwit each other many side-splitting situations occur, and when the dashing young matron prepares to enter the surf, her bathing booth is guarded by her admirers. In one scene Mrs. Blanc is seen disporting herself in the breakers, while the lovesick trio sit on the shore and wave their congratulations over her skill as a swimmer. On her shopping tours, no ordinary delivery wagon is permitted to transport her parcels. The members of the trio do the work instead. But all good things must have an end and Mrs. Blanc boards a train for home. As usual she is under escort. Just as adieus are being said, one of the trio jumps aboard and the other two quickly follow. They brighten the journey with their smiles and small talk. When her destination is reached Mrs. Blanc is greeted by her husband and baby and the Summer gallants are dumbfounded. They had not suspected the truth. But all ends pleasantly when Mrs. Blanc presents her husband to the strangers, who retire gracefully.

DIAMOND CUT DIAMOND (2 reel) (Dec. 7).—Nando, a member of the Italian Coast Guard, has just been married to a lovely young girl with whom he is greatly in love. They are living a very happy life in their humble home, Nando attending to the duties of the Government and his wife her duties at home.

One day while Nando is going his rounds, he sees a party of men and women in an open boat and, when they land on a barren section of the rocky coast, his suspicions are aroused and he decides to follow them. As he rows in, the chief of the band comes to meet him and tells him that they are a party of sightseers, but Nando recognizes one of their band as an ex-convict, which only confirms his suspicion that they are not on a sightseeing expedition, but that they have other plans which he has interrupted for the time being. Thinking that perhaps if he appears to fall in with their plans he might learn more of their purpose, he readily consents to row Rita, the queen of the band along the coast, so she might get a better view of it, as she suggests.

While they are out on the water, the band leaving the young girl on guard, climbs over the rocks and enters a cave, which has been their meeting place for some time past. The interior of the cave is fitted with various machines which are used in making spurious money, for they are a band of counterfeiters. After working for some time they signal Rita to return, as they have accomplished what they came for and wish to leave. They make their departure after Rita has thanked Nando, thinking that he has fallen completely under her spell.

After they leave, Nando sets out to explore the rocks to try and find what brought them there. He is successful in a short time, for he comes upon the entrance to the cave, where the band, in their hurry, have failed to properly replace the stone which covered the entrance. He is astounded when he finds the money they have coined in his absence, for he thought they were à band of smugglers.

Nando is so overcome by his discovery he cannot decide just what course to pursue, so goes home to think it over. His mind is so full of his discovery that he pays little attention to his young wife. She, of course, not knowing what has happened, imagines that he is tiring of her and gives way to her grief.

Nando keeps close guard for days over that particular part of the coast, which has been the scene of his discovery, but the band makes no effort to return. He realizes that it would be much better if he could catch them actually making the money, so waits his chance. In a day or two he is called to the door of his home by a man who hands him a note. It is from Rita asking him to meet her at the lighthouse that evening. Nando's wife watches him read the note with interest and resolves to see what is in it. Nando, after a hard day, lays down to obtain a little sleep before going to meet Rita. While he sleeps his wife takes the note from his pocket, and when she reads it, feels that she has been right in thinking that she was neglected. When Nando goes out to keep the appointment, she follows him and sees what she thinks to be a very affectionate meeting between Rita and Nando. Broken-hearted she returns home. In the meantime, Rita has induced the coast guard to go to her house the following evening, as the band desire to get him out of the way so they can work without the fear of interruption. He promises to come and leaves her, Rita going to tell her companions of her success.

Thinking that this will be a chance to capture the band, Nando goes to the police immediately after leaving Rita and tells the chief everything that has passed. He advises the coast guard to keep the appointment so as not to arouse the suspicions of the counterfeiters.

The next evening he sets out for Rita's house, followed by his broken-hearted wife, and, when she sees him enter the house, she goes to the police to see if they can do anything for her.

The band feeling that the coast is clear, go to the cave and work hard to make up for the time they wasted trying to put the guard on their track, that they do not hear the sound of people approaching, but are suddenly confronted with the revolvers of the police, for they have been followed and captured.

While all this has been taking place, Rita has been doing her utmost to fascinate Nando, trying to keep him with her until such a time as she knows the band will be on their way back. But she has reckoned without the coast guard, for the 'phone rings and she receives word of the capture of the band. When Nando's wife enters with the police and hears the story of Nando's loyalty to the Government, she is very much ashamed of her suspicions and very, very sorry, but Nando, with his bigness of heart, freely forgives her and they return to their former happy life.

ROMANCE AND REALITY (Dec. 2).—Robert Milbank, a rich young New Yorker is in love with handsome and stylish Claire Rich. Claire is secretly engaged to another man and as secretly regrets the step, for Robert appeals to her greatly. One evening, returning from a hall, he tells her of his love, and she is obliged to admit that she is promised to another. Robert takes the news hardly and leaves her, and, unable to control his desire for Claire, he goes upon a hunting trip to the West.

Robert secures a little cabin upon the Green Ranch, where he becomes intimately acquainted with Mr. and Mrs. Green and their pretty and unspoiled daughter Doris. Robert admires the girl and admiration turns to fascination of her pretty ways and her frank nature. He makes violent love to her and she falls under his spell readily. The process of this love passage is watched by a cowboy, Dick Miller, who would readily give his life to make Doris happy. He learns the truth from her lips, and while sorrowful, he hides his feelings as best he can, and when the cowboys get together and purchase wedding presents, he buys a gold locket and begs her to think of him sometimes and to appeal to him when in trouble.

The trouble comes quickly. Robert is greatly amused at the gaudy wedding presents and wounds the girl's susceptibilities and he offends the cowboys by his offishness. They stand it all for the sake of their little idol.

The wedding is near and the pretty dresses have been duly admired when Robert receives a brief note from his former flame, Claire. It tells him that she has broken off her marriage with her fiance and that she is free again. All the old love for the girl who is in his own stage of society surges up and he writes a brief note to Doris and rides away. Dick is entrusted with the delivery of the note and is a witness to the girl's terrible grief and loss of pride.

The cowboys ride after Robert and catch him and bring him back unbarmed at the request of Doris. Mr. Green would shoot the man, but Doris tells them that if he is harmed she will kill herself, so he is allowed to go.

Robert marries Claire and finds a handsome and cold partner, but poor Doris pines and dies with the faithful Dick near at hand.

THE GREATER LOVE (Dec. 2).—The hunchback is an inspired violinist. His brother also plays. He is strong and handsome and is the leader among the hardy fishermen of the coast. He protects his weaker brother and they love each other. One day the girl arrives at the fisher village. She is beautiful, but the world is dark to her for she is blind. Her old father obtains work with the fisher folk and they find strong friends in the two brothers. The hunchback grows to love her and she revels in his music. To her blind eyes all the world is beautiful. She does not realize that deformity exists and she tells the hunchback that he must be as handsome and as wonder-inspiring as his violin playing. This saddens him for he realizes his ugliness. The strong brother admires her beauty, but does not give her a second thought, for to him she is merely a poor blind girl. A great eye specialist comes to the village for his vacation and treats her eyes, but not with much hope. The hunchback prays that her eyesight will be restored although he realizes that if she can see his deformity she will shrink from him as from evil. The operation is performed and is successful. With her first impulse she calls for him; sees the strong brother with his violin and thinks it is he who was so kind to her. He at last realizes her beauty and loves her. They embrace. This is seen by the deformed, who creeps away to the sounding sea, his confident and friend during his long suffering. Playing his violin in a last sad requiem, he wanders into the depths, unthought of, while the lovers are relating their hopes and experiences. Suddenly the strong brother sees the hunchback at the mercy of the waves and rushes to him and bears him to the shore. But it is too late. The storm-swept soul has passed away.

BILLY JONES OF NEW YORK (Dec. 2).—Mario Bartini, an owner of a barber shop, sees an article in a newspaper about a well-known Italian count marrying a rich heiress. This gives Mario an idea which he decides to work out. He sells out his shop and goes away, leaving behind him a girl whom he is about to wed. The girl's father, enraged at Mario's treatment of his daughter, swears that if ever he should meet Bartini he would pay dearly for his action. Several years elapse when we are introduced to Billy Jones, a typical youth, who is going the pace too strong to suit his rich father. Billy quarrels with his father and the boy's independent spirit asserts itself. He tells his father that he is capable of taking care of himself, and that he will go out in the world to make his own way. Billy leaves his father and, with but a few dollars in his pocket, decides to spend that money for a ticket to some small town. He arrives in Bendersville broke, but regardless of that he registers at a first-class hotel, using his nerve to advantage; he starts out to look for something to turn up and it does. He catches a glimpse of Mary McCarthy, the daughter of a wealthy contractor of the town. It is a case of love at first sight with the boy; he is determined now to remain in the town and make the acquaintance of the girl. Billy secures a position as time clerk on one of Mr. McCarthy's contracting operations, but does not realize that he is working for the girl's father until one day she rides up to the works in her auto to visit her father. Billy has an opportunity to get acquainted with Mary and receives encouragement from her. Count Carloni is paying attention to Mary and is encouraged by the girl's mother, who welcomes the Count as a prospective son-in-law. The father is indifferent, but the girl rebels and declares that she will marry a man of her choice and not a titled fortune-hunter. All arguments are of no avail. The girl promptly falls in love with Billy, which is opposed to by the mother. At Mr. McCarthy's works is an Italian foreman, no other than the father of the girl whom the barber deceived. Both father and daughter have made their home in Bendersville. The father is hurt by a premature explosion and, being assisted by Billy, he is brought home. Billy becomes acquainted with Rosa and later, when Billy meets Rosa at the works, he accompanies her on her way home. Mary sees them together, becomes jealous and refuses to listen to Billy's explanations. But things are put right. When Mr. McCarthy brings his daughter and the Count to look over the works the Italian foreman recognizes in Count Carloni no other than Mario the barber. Billy prevents the foreman from killing Mario, who later escapes, terrified, and takes the first train out of town. The Italian and his daughter explain the deception and the McCarthy's are thankful that the bogus Count has been exposed. This paves the way nicely for Billy and Mary, receiving no opposition from Mary's parents.

THE WHEEL OF DESTINY (Dec. 8).—Scenes are laid in the South just after the war, and New York at the present time.—At the opening of the story Giles leaves home to go to a gambling house, the Major admonishing him to return early. Giles gambles and comes home drunk. Eph, who knows the habits of his young master, is waiting at the gate and helps him into his cabin. The Major, still waiting, goes to the cabin and finds Giles, drunk and silly. He disowns him and drives him from the cabin, despite the entreaties of the old couple. Giles goes, never to return to the old home. At the close of the war the Major is impoverished and his plantation is sold for debt. He takes leave of his old home and Eph and Chloe beg to go with him, but he declines their assistance. He has no home and is a widower.

The story is carried forward a number of years. Chloe and Eph are living in the North. Eph has a job as a "white wings," or street sweeper, and is working on the street when the Major, his old master, approaches, down and out, with tattered clothing and in ill health. It is the day before Thanksgiving, and Eph and Chloe have been saving money, which they have deposited in a can or jar, which rests on the mantel. Eph quits his job on the street and takes the Major to his home. Chloe has gone out to deliver a washing. Eph is shocked to see his old master in such a plight, so he takes the money saved for the Thanksgiving dinner, goes out and buys the Major a cheap suit of clothing. He returns to his job and is fired for quitting the work. He decides to obtain a turkey by some hook or crook and goes to a typical turkey raffle, participated in by colored men and spends his last nickel in an endeavor to win a turkey, but is unsuccessful. Rendered desperate, he resolves to steal a turkey and climbs a fence and approaches a chicken. His conscience smites him, and he turns away to be arrested by an officer, who has followed him, attracted by his suspicious movements, and he is in despair. Arrested just as he has found his old master renders him dumb with grief. The copper takes him to the police station where Giles, his young master, is judge. Eph recognizes him and there is a happy reunion. Eph is in a quandary as to appraising Giles of the presence of his father at his home. The copper explains that he caught Eph in the act of entering a hen-coop, and Giles laughs. He enters the police station and soon explains matters to the officer-in-charge, to emerge with Eph a free man. He takes Eph in a motor car to his home, stopping on the way to buy trimmings for a Thanksgiving dinner. Eph remains silent and they go to the cabin where Giles finds Chloe, his old mammy and his father, and there is a happy and highly dramatic reunion, with the tables turned—the son rich and able to support his father and the two faithful old servants.

THE RIGHTS OF A SAVAGE (Dec. 3).—The unwritten law is the keynote to this stirring Western release. A gambler caught red-handed cheating at the old trick of short cards, and though wounded, he gets away, eludes pursuers, seeks shelter and is cared for by a semi-civilized Hopi Indian, who takes the man to his pueblo, and in return, as is the way of his kind, the gambler induces his squaw to elope with him. The redskin takes his loss stoically. Three years later, it is the Fourth of July at Circle City and the ranch hands from the surrounding country are whooping things up, roping, tieing steers, riding bucking bronchos, and the world famous cowboy pastime called "bulldogging a steer" are being indulged in, right in the main street of Circle City, when we see our trio meet. Events from now on move quickly to a logical conclusion, and the red man claims the inherent right of his race to revert to savagery and repay the gambler in his own way. A big story told in a big way, as only the big Universal Bison Company can tell these tales of the big West. Cowboys, Indians, hundreds of horses and long-horn cattle are sprinkled through the film in true atmospheric fashion. This is one you can't afford to miss. See it and you will always remember it.

VICTOR

THE FOOLISHNESS OF OLIVER (Dec. 6).—Oliver Benton is a gay young man about town, whose chief occupation consists in killing time and looking for excitement. His father and mother, who are very wealthy, are also deeply religious and have planned a marriage for him with the charming daughter of a minister. Oliver has never been in love and much prefers the society of his bosom friends, De Lacey, a well-known artist, and "Reggie" Smythe, a man who inherited more money than brains. One night, after breaking away from his home circle and the minister's daughter, Oliver joins his two friends and goes with them to a theatre, where they go back on the stage to visit some show girls. Here, the men are introduced to the latest acquisition to the company. Sybil Caldwell, a pretty, modest little girl, who has taken her profession seriously. Oliver, for the first time in his life, feels the touch of the tender passion and goes away raving over Sybil's good looks and sweet manner. De Lacey has invited a crowd of the show folks to his studio for a supper that night after the performance, and Sybil, although at first refusing to go, is finally induced by one of her roommates to attend.

De Lacey has also been smitten by Sybil's charms, and when she arrives, pays her every attention. He tries to get her to drink wine, which she refuses to do, and his efforts displease Oliver very much. Finally, during the evening, De Lacey's attention becomes so marked as to become offensive to Sybil, and she tries to get her girl friend to return home with her. Oliver now interferes, and after a bitter quarrel with De Lacey, he offers to escort Sybil home and she accepts. Then follows a series of humorous meetings between Oliver and Sybil, which ends by their sudden marriage. Oliver proudly takes his little bride home and introduces her to his family. Here, however, they are received with horror by his parents and his father orders him out of the house, never to return. The only kindness Sybil receives at the house is at the hands of the minister's daughter, who deeply sympathizes with the young couple. Oliver and his wife have but little money and are forced to begin their honeymoon in a light-housekeeping room in a poor tenement. A month later they find themselves reduced to a diet of bread and water, and are reminded by the landlady that they are two weeks behind in their rent. Oliver manfully tries to obtain work, but being unpractical he meets with complete failure. The landlady, who is not a bad sort, has a husband who is a waiter in a high-class cafe, and she induces him to try to obtain a waiter's position for Oliver. Oliver is willing to do anything by this time and gladly accepts the offer, and being taken to the cafe is engaged by the manager. Sybil, however, is comforted. Oliver gets along fairly well in his new position until De Lacey and Reggie, his former chums, enter the place, and he is assigned to wait upon them. These two men proceed to do everything in their new power to humiliate him. While this is going on Oliver's father happens in also, and is mortified beyond expression at seeing Oliver serving in such an inferior capacity. While he is staring blankly at his son he is made aware of the insults being heaped upon that same son by his former friends, and Oliver, leaving for the kitchen, he rises and going to De Lacey and Reggie, he calls them a pair of cads and tells them they ought to be ashamed of themselves. When Oliver returns the old man tries to get him to leave, but Oliver reminds him that he drove him from home and that he must, therefore, support his wife as best he may. Oliver refusing to talk further with him, the old man obtains Oliver's address from the manager of the cafe and goes out. After the departure of his father, Oliver is forced to return again to De Lacey and Reggie, the former desiring a croquette which has been served him, returned to the kitchen. Oliver's temper, which has already been strained to the breaking point, can stand no more and he points to the dish and commands De Lacey to eat it. De Lacey grows very indignant as does also Reggie, who rises to expostulate. Slamming Reggie back in his chair, Oliver seizes De Lacey by the back of the head and with the other hand rubs the croquette, dish and all in De Lacey's face. In the confusion which ensues Oliver is discharged by the manager and returns home to find that his father has preceded him. He arrives just as Sybil has ordered the old man from the room, he having offered her a large sum of money in exchange for her life of bread and water, on condition that she leave Oliver. The son joins the wife in ordering the father away, and the old man goes to the door, but there breaks down, and, coming back, begs Sybil's pardon and asks Oliver to return home with his wife, whom he knows to be true blue.

A TANGLED MARRIAGE (Dec. 8).—Pearl has broken her engagement to Chester after a quarrel. The next day Chester receives a letter informing him that his late uncle's will, just found, provides that he receive a legacy of $25,000, conditioning, however, that he marry within a year from the date of his uncle's death. He learns that the year expires that very day and immediately rushes to Pearl so as to induce her to marry him at once.

Meanwhile Second Story Bill, who has escaped from jail, enters the house of the minister who is to marry Pearl and Chester. Bill makes the minister change clothes with him and locks the reverend gentleman in the clothes-closet. Pearl and Chester enter and Bill, disguised as the minister, marries them. He gets some of Chester's money and then escapes. The minister meanwhile is making a terrible noise in the clothes-closet and Chester lets him out. Explanations are in order and Pearl and Chester are more than dismayed when they find that they have not been legally married. However, with but one minute left before the expiration of the year allotted to him, Chester induces the minister to marry them, and all ends happily with Chester in possession of the legacy.

THE BLACK PRINCE.—"Ragtime" Simmons, a colored gentleman, gets a job with a Hindoo fortune teller. Adorned in Hindoo raiment, he parades around the street with a sign on his back, advertising the great occult powers of the clairvoyant. Tired, he falls asleep in the garden of the house where his wife is housemaid. Edith, the daughter of the household, and Mrs. Simmons' mistress, read in the newspapers of the arrival in the city of a Hindoo prince, a multi-millionaire. She strolls in the garden and sees "Ragtime." She invites him into the house thinking him the prince, and entertains him. He makes love to Edith and is recognized by his wife, who chases him all over the house with a carving knife. Edith's father protests and she chases him up into the garret, where, after having been stripped of his glad raiment and wearing an old bag, Simmons is hiding. Father hits "Ragtime" over the head with a mallet and brings him downstairs, where Mrs. "Ragtime" explains that he is no prince, but her husband, and takes him home to deal further with him.

TWIXT LOVE AND AMBITION (Dec. 5).—Marie Wayne, a musician of rare ability, sings one evening in a concert and attracts the attention of a manager, who offers her a position on the stage. Her lover, John Sterne, pleads with her to decline and urges her to marry. Love and ambition struggle desperately. Ambition conquers, and the two go their separate ways. Finally the widowed sister of John Sterne dies, leaving her little boy, a child of four or five. Dan is particularly winning, and the young man finds new interest in life. For the sake of the boy's health he buys a little home in the country, and, entrusting him to the care of an old Irish woman whom he believes to be reliable, he goes to the city every morning to business, returning in the evening. Meanwhile Marie has scored a triumph in foreign lands, but is unable to forget John. At length she returns and rents for the Summer a beautiful country place bordering upon the same mountain village near which John and the child are living. Unacquainted with her name, the villagers call her the Lady of the Hills. One day when driving in her motor-car she is attracted by a beautiful boy, who is playing by the roadside. Marie makes the acquaintance of Dan, who responds readily. She sees the child often, and a tender feeling is aroused in her. Marie and John are each entirely ignorant of the proximity of the other, but the climax comes when Dan is rescued from drowning by the unknown lady. Old Martha, the nurse, is addicted to drink, and one day imbibes too freely and falls asleep when sitting with Dan on the bank overlooking the river. Dan has a toy boat. He thinks it would be charming to see it float on the water. He scrambles down the bank, sees several boats secured at the landing and climbs into one. He leans over too far, falls into the water, when Marie, who is rowing on the river, catches sight of him. She rows rapidly, springs out of her boat, and saves him. Old Martha wakes, looks around for the child, and hurries in search of him. While she is gone Marie climbs up the bank with Dan in her arms. She takes him to her home and puts him to bed. Frightened, Martha returns to the river, sees the child's hat, and concludes that Dan is drowned. She goes back and telephones the news to John Sterne. John hurries home. Just after he arrives, Marie, signing herself merely, "Dan's Friend," sends her chauffeur with a note to old Martha, instructing her to come for Dan in the motor-car. John, overjoyed to know that Dan is alive, springs into the motor-car, and, unsuspecting, is driven to Marie's home. When John enters Marie is bending over Dan, telling him a fairy tale. John enters quietly. At the sight of Marie he starts violently. Marie springs to her feet.

The two stand staring in astonishment. In their surprise, the love of each for the other is revealed. Dan catches sight of his uncle and claps his hands for joy. Laughing, Marie pushes him down. She and John kneel on either side of the lounge and the two clasp hands across the little form.

HIS FATHER'S CHOICE (Dec. 6).—Jack Halsted is in love with Gertrude Terry, a very fine, but poor girl. When his father, Ravel Halsted, discovers that Jack intends to marry a poor nobody, he threatens to cut him off without a cent, and he tells Jack he won't have a gum-chewing, slangy girl for a daughter-in-law. Jack tries to explain that Gertrude is in every way a lady, but his father won't listen. Jack then insists that he will marry the girl he loves, and his father, furious, stamps out of the room. Jack being dependent on his father, is in a fine predicament, and goes to a Mrs. Robbins for advice. Her sympathies are all with Jack, and she asks him to bring the girl, and perhaps they will be able to think of some plan. Jack brings Gertrude and Mrs. Robbins falls in love with her. The two young people are in despair. They tell Mrs. Robbins their story and in each other's arms, they weep exceedingly hard. Indeed, they weep so hard that Jack has to take off his coat after a while and hang it on a chair to dry, for the shoulder is quite wet with Gertrude's tears. She, wishing to wipe Jack's tears away, takes out her powder puff from her purse instead of a handkerchief, and proceeds to powder Jack's face. Mrs. Robbins nearly goes into convulsions. Then Jack decided that they will both commit suicide, and shows how he will first shoot himself and then Gertrude, and they will lay down in a nice position, and die in each other's arms. Presently the father comes in, and staring hard at Gertrude, remembers that he has met her at a society function. Papa Halsted and Mrs. Robbins give each other the wink and the scene ends with "God bless you, my children."

PATHE'S WEEKLY, NO. 49 (Dec. 2).

THE ELECTRIC LAUNDRY (Dec. 3).—A blessing to all housewives. It does away with Monday's drudgery. Place the soiled clothes in a basket, turn on the current and they are, automatically, taken to the modern laundry. They are washed and ironed by electricity, and, while you wait, they are returned to your home. Great idea. And so simple it's a wonder no one ever thought of it before.

On the same reel:

PARIS AND ITS MONUMENTS.—A series of views of the artistic beauties of Paris, its churches, its memorials, Eiffel Tower, Alexander Bridge and the tomb of the Great Napoleon.

HIS LITTLE INDIAN MODEL (Dec. 4).—Frank Russell, a celebrated artist, is painting an Indian subject and has for a model an Indian girl around whom there seems to hang some mysterious suggestion of English ancestry. As the days go by the kindly disposition of the painter wins the heart of the Indian maiden. Mrs. Russell pays a visit to her husband's camp and is greeted affectionately by him. This enrages Silver Cloud so much that she attempts to kill her rival, and nearly succeeds. While this thrilling scene is being enacted, Russell has succeeded in learning from the Indian woman who claims to be the mother of the girl that Silver Cloud is really a white girl and that many years before, two children were saved from a shipwreck, one of them being adopted by white settlers and the other taken by the savages. This knowledge completes a chain of circumstances which convince Russell that his wife and his little Indian model are sisters, and the very interesting, finely photographed film ends happily.

THE TENACIOUS LOVER (Dec. 5).—It needed somewhat extraordinary persistency for Tom Jenkins to win Myrtle Townsend over the prejudices of her family. But Tom was always a master of strategy. When he learns that his prospective sister-in-law has been ordered by the doctor to secure the services of a nurse for her baby, he masquerades as a woman and gets the job. An English lord is anxious to win the hand of Myrtle, and while at the house Tom has an opportunity to prove the worthless character of the favored suitor. Of course, the duties of his new capacity place Tom in many predicaments and his efforts to avoid discovery are highly amusing.

AN ESCAPE OF GAS (Dec. 6).—When a maid makes a hit with Max nothing can keep him from telling her of his love. The versatile comedian intercepts a gasman who is going to repair a leak at the home of Max's sweetheart and takes his place. Fortunately, Max mistakes the water pipe for the gas pipe, and in the deluge that follows, the objections of the girl and her father are drowned.

On the same reel:

THE OCTOPUS.—A close observation of this much-feared inhabitant of the seas.

THE SPENDTHRIFT'S REFORM (Dec. 7).—Dan Steele, a "man-about-town," is a consistent loser at cards, which compels Mrs. Steele to ask for money of her father, with whom the Steeles make their home. The stern old gentleman refuses to give her money for any purpose other than to educate her son. From this allowance Mrs. Steele saves a little for a rainy day. The rainy day arrives. Steele returns home late one night and his patient wife is waiting for him. He confides to her that his creditors have driven him to the wall. Mrs. Steele offers to secure the necessary money from her savings in a strong box which she keeps beneath her father's safe. Steele's heart is touched by this and he takes an oath to quit gambling forever. Her father, awakened by Mrs. Steele passing through his room, secures his revolver. In the darkness he sees a figure crouched near the safe and he fires. There are troublesome times in the Steels household until Mrs. Steele is pronounced out of danger. When she is well again she keeps her promise to pay Steele's present debts, and Steele keeps his promise.

THANHOUSER

AT LIBERTY—GOOD PRESS AGENT (Dec. 8).—He limped along the Rialto, so badly bunged up that a friend felt impelled to ask if he had been playing a Bomb on the Mafia Circuit in the "Big Time."

"It is just another case of a man getting the worst of it for making good," he explained. "I consented to go out with 'The Whirling Dervish' Company, and I told Governor that he would get something new in the press work line. That big doll of a star wanted her name in the papers, but there is nothing to her, nothing at all."

"They won't fall for the old stuff any more, and I had to be up to date. We struck one town where they had a smallpox scare, and they fell for my dope all right. I told them how one of our chorus dames had smallpox, and how the star passed the night nursing her when all the others were afraid, kissed her fevered brow and all the rest of that sob stuff. They fell for it like wolves, and that big false alarm got her picture on the front page.

"Was she grateful? Not a bit of it. She blamed me when the health department sent around and rounded up the company, quarantining them in a vacant house. Look at the ad, boy, look at the ad. Why my story was printed all over the United States. But the company was peevish and then some.

"They'd have got out in a few weeks, and it saved them from losing money on those rotten 'killduff' one-night stands, yet they beefed awfully. So I showed them how to escape by scaring off the guards by pretending to be ghosts. (That is some press agent stunt, too, Bo.) I led them safely through the town to a freight train, so that they could make a getaway to the next town. Were they thankful? Nothing like it. The leading comedian and 'props' beat me with clubs and knocked me off the train. And that big 'dub' of a star cheered them as they were doing it.

"So, I've left the company. Wouldn't care to work with a company like that, for you never are appreciated. Doubt if they will stay out long, for the company is rotten, the printing punk, and the bookings the worst ever. Now I am back again, and say, old man, do you know anyone who wants a good press agent? Frohman wants me, but there are some things about his office I don't like."

AURORA FLOYD (2 reels) (Dec. 10).—Aurora Floyd was the daughter of a rich banker. While a schoolgirl she contracted a romantic attachment for her father's groom, James Conyers, and eloped with him. Their married life was unhappy, as her husband was vulgar, cruel and a drunkard. Her father, when he found how affairs were going, offered Conyers a large sum of money on condition that he leave England never to return. Conyers eagerly accepted the proposition, and Aurora returned to her father's home, not even their friends being aware that Aurora had been married. Six months later a newspaper account told of the death of the worthless groom. Aurora was now free and when John Mellish, the young squire of Felden Park, paid her attentions, she consented to become his wife, much to her father's satisfaction.

Aurora entered Felden Hall as the squire's bride just about the time that Mellish engaged a new trainer for his racehorse. In this man Aurora, to her horror, recognized Conyers, her first husband, and she realized that the story of his death was only a cruel trick. Conyers boldly blackmailed her, explaining that unless she yielded to his demands for money he would have her prosecuted as a bigamist. The note containing his threat was brought to the hall by Steve, a half-witted stable boy. He suspected something was wrong, spied upon Aurora, and while she was out of the room returned through the window, picked up the note she had dropped in her agitation, and armed himself with the squire's pistol, meaning to use it to subdue Conyers.

The helpless Aurora met Conyers at a place agreed upon and turned over to him all the money and jewels she could get together. She then returned toward the house to decide upon her future plans. Steve, who had tracked them, now confronted Conyers and demanded a share of the spoils. Conyers refused, and started to beat Steve. The boy, wild with rage, shot him down, took the satchel of jewels and money, dropped the pistol beside his victim, and escaped. The shot had been heard in the house, and Mellish and Mrs. Powell, his housekeeper, started out to investigate. Their path led them toward Aurora, and she, to elude them, retraced her steps. Thus she came upon the body, and when the others, arrived she was bending over the body, the pistol in her hand. Mrs. Powell, who always hated her young mistress, denounced Aurora as a murderess, and the case against her was black. Her gallant husband, however, stood loyally by her, even when the secret of her marriage was revealed to him. In court he was at her side, fighting desperately to save the life of the woman he loved.

Aurora was convicted of murder, and was about to be sentenced, when Steve, the real criminal, was dragged in and confessed. The spirit of the man he had slain haunted him, he declared, and practically drove him into the arms of the law. Aurora, humble and contrite because of her terrible experiences, meekly begged her husband to forgive and forget her, but he clasped her in his arms, telling her she was the one woman he loved, and that in the happiness of their future life they would forget the sorrows that had been.

MAJESTIC

THE HYPNOTIC CHAIR (Dec. 1).—Professor Henrick has invented a wonderful hypnotic chair which, when the proper current is turned on, possesses the power of mesmerizing dozens of people at the same time. His friends give him a banquet, and after he drinks a great many toasts, he decides to finish the night on the Great White Way, instead of returning home. Miss Gaylife accompanies him, and in his friendly mood he invites many extraordinary people to visit him. His wife, discovering he has not come home all night, starts out for his office and arrives just as the professor and his assistant, Professor Scardon, are trying to persuade Miss Gaylife to leave the office. She refuses and they get an idea. They place her in the hypnotic chair, and when the furious wife enters she is told that Miss Gaylife is a patient. Just then the bell rings and a street cleaner is shown in. To quiet him, the professor pushes him toward Miss Gaylife—he touches her gown—the current is turned on and he stands powerless also. The scientific commission visits the professor and comes in contact with the others and is immediately electrified. But the doctor's assistant puts on rubber gloves and proceeds to release them one by one. General confusion ensues and as Mrs. Hendrick still shows fight she is pushed back into the chair while the professor, his assistant and Miss Gaylife start back to the White Way, leaving a sign on the door informing all callers that they will be "gone for six months."

IN OLD TOWN (Dec. 3).—Peggy Milton returns to the old town from a fashionable boarding school. She is met at the depot by her affectionate parents and her old sweetheart, Tom Harland. But Peggy has been spoiled by the fashionable school. She is now vain, romantic and silly, and thinks that her parents and home are old-fashioned, and the world about her entirely wrong.

She is cold to Tom, and snubs her parents, and they cannot understand. When she gets to the house she begins to cry because it is not like the swell residences of her classmates. She finds fault with her room and decorates it with college flags, photographs of athletic teams, and rah-rah boys, and altogether makes it silly looking. She sits around the house eating candy and reading silly novels while her mother does the housework—never helping. She ridicules the town boys who call on her and finally gets the girls together, shows them her scrap books and tells them how swell the boys are out East. They primp up, imitate her with her affected hair dressing, big bows on her dress, etc., and they snub the boys of the neighborhood.

Tom Harland comes to call and sees her reading a pile of novels. He is disgusted, and goes to talk with her father on the back porch. The old man tells his troubles, so does the mother, and Tom is taken up to look at the room, unknown to Peggy. He studies the pictures and his disappointment at her treatment changes to mirth. He has an idea and whispers it to the old man, who howls and whispers it to his wife, who laughs as well. Tom leaves, carrying with him the scrap book of photographs. That night he and the fellows get together and dress themselves up to look like the college boys in the scrap book, exaggerating the types, of course. They cut their hats to be small, paint loud checks on old suits of clothes, cut themselves little canes from the bushes, and then, with cuffs on their trousers, big neckties and little hats, puffing cigarettes and enormous pipes, they all stand up and give a college yell. Tom leads the practice and is so successful in the rehearsal that the town constable comes to find out the cause of the noise. When they tell him, he enjoys the joke, too. There is a ball at the Lodge Hall, of the old town that night. So, the fellows start out to call for their sweethearts. Tom goes for Peggy, who has dressed in many frills and furbelows. She is disgusted at his costume and refuses to go. But her parents, who are delighted at the lesson to be taught her, make her go right along.

At the dance hall the fellows all come in and get in the middle of the floor and give college cheers, etc., to the disgust of the girls, who cannot understand. They keep up this parody of college life until the girls are weeping with vexation and shame. Then they go on with their dancing. Tom shows Peggy home, and afterwards the boys give her a serenade in true college style, playing on mandolins, with barbershop harmonies, which are almost too much for them.

Next day, Tom, with a more exaggerated costume, borrows an automobile and a chauffeur from a friend and comes to take Peggy for a ride. He has it filled with champagne bottles and pretends to be half-drunk already, assuring her that he is the village sport. He carries this on until at last she is disgusted, and begs him to be himself, whereupon he tells her the truth, and they end up with an engagement party, where all the girls are dressed in a sweet, simple manner, and the quiet fun and orderly behavior is substituted for the college type of it, in the "old town."

SOLAX

THE HATER OF WOMEN (Dec. 11).—Bob Burton, a confirmed woman-hater, meets his chum Harry. On their way from New York Harry asks him to come to his home and introduces him to his sister. She teases the woman-hater, pins a rose in his buttonhole and gets him to sit down on a sofa beside her. Harry says joshingly, "You are not such a woman-hater after all."

Harry arrives at the club and tells his friends what a joke he has played on Bob. Thinking of a scheme, he makes his friend still more uncomfortable. He writes a newspaper ad saying that Bob wants a wife. Harry inserts the ad in the newspaper and two of his chums go to Bob's house to watch this out to the end.

The first arrival in answer to the ad is an old maid. Harry directs her to the house, while he and his friends arrange a board so that they can look into the window and watch the proceedings. Bob Burton is very much surprised when the old maid shows him the ad in the newspaper. She tries to make him marry her, but he protests. The old maid goes out and discovers the boys looking in the window, hits one of them with an umbrella, and they all fall over the bench.

The second arrival is a tough girl, who gets into a wrangle with Bob, and he throws her out of the window and she falls on top of the boys, who are seated on the plank. She has her scraps with them and exits.

The third arrival is a very buxom middle-aged lady, who, on refusal of Bob to marry her, exits angrily, discovers Harry and chum outside, and gives Harry a thrashing.

The fourth arrival is a young, eccentric girl, who has sworn that she will never marry a man unless she falls in love with him at sight. Bob Burton has read this eccentric remark in the paper, and has seen the picture, so, instead of refusing her he proposes and is accepted much to the chagrin of the boys outside. He exits from the house with the young lady and discovers the boys in the act of sneaking away. Finally he turns the tables on them. He sends Harry and Bob a note inviting them to his wedding.

THE GIRL IN THE ARMCHAIR (Dec. 13).—Frank Watson was spending a month in New York, when one day he received a letter from his father requesting him to come home and also that a surprise awaited him on his return. This aroused Frank's curiosity, so immediately he made preparations to leave at once. On arriving home he went at once to the drawing-room, and there to his surprise, he saw a very attractive girl sitting by the fireplace, seeming to be perfectly at home with her surroundings. Frank coughs. The girl turns around and then nods to him, but leaves the room at once. Just then his mother and father come in and greet him. At once Frank begins to question them about the girl. For an answer Frank's father walks to the desk and brings Frank a letter. There he learns that this girl is the daughter of his father's best friend, who has just died, and has made his father guardian. The girl's name is Peggy, and has been left a large fortune. Frank does not approve of this and begins to offer his objections. At the same time Peggy is seen coming down the stairs at the back of the room and accidentally overhears what Frank is saying. She then comes into the room and they are both introduced.

Six months later we find Frank in bad company. He has started gambling and has hard times settling all his debts. At present he owes $500 to a very miserly Jew, who has Frank's promissory note to pay in a week's time. Poor Frank is almost a nervous wreck for he has no means by which he can lift this debt. The day has come and we now see Frank nervously awaiting the Jew's arrival. The Jew is ushered in and at once starts business. He then learns that Frank is unable to pay and then swears that he will go to Frank's father for payment. Frank pleads not to tell his father. The Jew looks around the room in order to find some plan with which to force Frank to pay. Suddenly he notices a small safe in the desk marked "Emergency Safe." He calls Frank's attention to it. After much arguing the Jew has persuaded Frank to get his payment from this safe with the hope of winning it back and then replace the money before the father finds it out. Frank takes the money, gets a receipt from the Jew and orders him out. Frank leaves the room at once. Suddenly we see Peggy getting up out of the large chair by the fireplace. She has accidentally overheard all that has passed between them without their knowledge and she realizes Frank's position at once. She decides to help Frank out of his trouble and starts to think of a plan. Later we see her coming into the drawing-room all ready for a journey, carrying a suitcase in her hand. She puts a letter on the table for Frank's father and then leaves the house.

The girl makes a splendid sacrifice to save Frank, and later, in an impressive scene, Frank admits his guilt and asks for forgiveness of the girl he has grown to love.

ECLAIR

THE BUSY BEE (Nov. 8).—This film most entertainingly depicts the picturesque industry of apiculture or bee cultivation.

It shows men's ingenuity in furnishing and decoying the bee into a home of its own which is known as a hive or hive-house.

The perfection of these hives is as essential as would be the building of a mansion for a multi-millionaire, for bees are workers and, like all real workers, they demand system and facility. So it is necessary to prepare the waxen foundation for the bee's home, or comb, to use the proper word, in a laboratory. All of which is shown in its various evolutions.

Then are shown the bees at work in their hive, each striving in competition with the others in other separate cells. The Queen Bee is seen and described by careful subtitling.

The artifice of bee swarming is carefully portrayed and then is shown the clever manipulations by which the honey is collected, still leaving the bee his house and structure, in which he will again faithfully perform the same labors in the season to come.

On the same reel:

FUNNICUS' HUNTING EXPLOITS.—Funnicus is hunting, while at his home many of his friends await his return very impatiently. Suddenly he makes his appearance, his game-bag full—of newspapers. He tells his friends that he actually disdains small game, and to illustrate the story of his wondrous adventures turns the house topsy-turvy. His wife, alarmed, advises him to go to bed and calm his excited brain.

Nightmares disturb his sleep. He finds himself in Africa, traveling on camel, accompanied by many guides. He arrives at an Arab's camp and jests with the Arabian maidens, who, for revenge, put out his fires in the forest the following night. The fires out, the wild beasts arrive, and he just has time to climb a tree, where he is out of reach of two big lions who wait for him at the foot of the tree.

Our great hunter courageously risks his life by descending from the tree. He tries to strangle the lion but suddenly awakens and finds himself clutching at his wife's throat.

THE BLACK SHEEP (Dec. 10).—Jim Brock, a reckless, self-indulgent but kind-hearted youth, through the jealous machinations of his younger brother is driven from home by his father.

The seriousness of the breach with his parents—to whom he is really devoted—brings the young prodigal to his senses. His years of exile turn out to be his making.

In the meantime, the younger brother, now absolute master of the situation at home, has thrown off all disguises and appears in his true character of the successful and undutiful son who is ashamed of his aged parents. At his hands, and at those of his equally domineering wife, the old folks learn, with all the bitterness of Lear himself, how sharper than a serpent's tooth is the ingratitude of a thankless child.

Matters have approached their crisis when the black sheep returns unexpectedly. He has amassed immense wealth and with this potent weapon he resolves to fight his upstart brother and strike him where the blow may prove most effective.

The two brothers meet on the floor of the Stock Exchange. . . . It is a death grapple. . . . The ingrate, Henry, emerges from it crushed and ruined. . . . The very home where he has lorded it so insolently passes into the hands of the avenger.

Jim loses no time in putting the house in order.

THE POISONED POOL (Dec. 12).—Two young prospectors, finding that the old mine in which they had sunk their entire capital has long since yielded up its last handfull of pay-rock, set out together across the hills in search of new fields. One night in the flickering light of their campfire Rice discovers evidence in the pocket of his sleeping partner which convinces him that the latter has been successful in winning the love of a girl to whose hand he also had aspired. He masters his first passionate impulse to kill the man. By morning his jealousy has subsided into a dangerously smouldering hatred which is silent and bides its time.

All unconscious of the events of the night and of the peril which now walks with him, Starret continues his quest for gold with the other. One day their supply of water fails them. In their search for a spring they wander far from their camp and are lost. When they finally come upon a sinister-looking pool in the wilderness, young Starret is on the point of collapse. From the incrustations about its rim Rice sees that the hole is reeking with arsenic. At first he struggles to keep the half-crazed Starret away from it. The scene of the night beside the fire comes back to him. The man in him gives place to the demon—he flings his partner upon his face to drink of the noxious liquor.

Providence, in the guise of a heavy downpour of rain, visits Starret. He had fortunately fainted before his lips could touch the poison. Reviving, he wanders back to the camp and, seeing that abandoned, he finds his way to Bess Austin's cabin. There an encounter takes place, as a result of which Rice returns to the poisoned pool alone—to drink!

RELIANCE

JOE'S REWARD (Dec. 11).—Joe, a prisoner in the state penitentiary, is paroled with the proviso that he remain in his own state. Filled with joy he goes to the country, where he gets work as a farm hand. The farmer, a hard-headed old fellow, learning that Joe is an ex-convict, treats him cruelly. The boy's only comfort is Mary, the pretty eighteen-year-old doughter of the farmer. Her kindness wins Joe's heart and they are soon deeply in love. The farmer learning of this sends the boy away. But Mary refuses to let him go alone and they elope. They are married, and later Joe learns of some little homesteads to be had across the state border. So he breaks his parole to take his wife where she will have a home and some comfort. His monthly reports he sends to a friend in the other state and he mails them to the warden. The farmer learning what Joe has done, goes to the jail and tells. Joe is arrested and brought back. But when he tells the warden his story—how he tried to make a living and couldn't, how the farmer hounded him and tried to wreck his home and happiness, the warden hands him a life parole and sets him free to return home. And when he arrives there are two waiting to greet him, for a little baby has arrived while he was away. And as Joe gathers his wife and child into his arms he shows them his parole and thanks God that he is at last a free man.

motion picture projecting machine there is accuracy, fine workmanship and material which is truly amazing to those who know. The design represents the most advanced thought in motion picture machine construction. No detail in the mechanism, lamp, lamphouse or stand has been too trivial for careful attention.

The materials used are the best for the purpose regardless of expense. They are worked into the finished parts with infinite care by the most expert mechanics and machines obtainable.

Some of the operations require precision which was impossible to get with the machinery available on the American and European markets, so we designed and built in our own factory at an expense of thousands of dollars, machinery and tools which would give us the accuracy our high standard demanded.

Such methods guarantee you screen results and machine satisfaction such as you have never known before.

You owe it to yourself, Mr. Exhibitor and Mr. Operator, to get posted. Don't let a day go by before writing us for catalogue B, giving full description and also name and address of the nearest dealer who has the Simplex projector in stock ready for your inspection and ultimate use.

The Price You Pay $275.00 The Quality You Get

Gears and pinions of steel and specially tough cast iron with spiral cut teeth so designed that they roll together without friction. Accurate to within one two-thousandth of an inch, they insure you against noise, play in the gears and rapid wear. The high-speed gears are hardened.

Spindles of steel, hardened and ground exactly to size. Size is generous, smallest 5/16-inch, largest ½-inch in diameter. Cannot easily become sprung. Wearing quality recognized as the best.

Bearings of cast iron. The pores retain the oil. This material is acknowledged by experts to be the best for the purpose.

Sprockets cut in our own factory of specially selected steel on machines of our own design and make. The size, shape and accuracy of the teeth, especially of the intermittent sprocket, account largely for the steady picture which the Simplex Projector is noted for.

Intermittent movement. The star or Geneva and its spindle are one piece of metal. The crescent-shaped locking surfaces are cut on a machine which works so close an auxiliary scale had to be designed to set it. The pin wheel or cam is perfectly concentric with its own centre of rotation. The pin which trips the Geneva is hardened, ground and lapped.

Space prevents further mention here of other excellent features.

We invite you to visit our factory and see for yourself the machinery, tools and high-class labor which guarantee you perfection in the Simplex Projector.

The Simplex must be seen and used to be fully appreciated.

EDUCATIONAL FILMS AND THE FIRE DEPARTMENT

DURING the past week it was my province to inquire into a matter of great interest to every manufacturer of projecting machines. I have been speaking so long of the educational advantages to be derived from the use of films of a high order in schools, churches, etc., not being fully aware of one great obstacle in the way, which I discovered thus: A certain church, whose name, for obvious reasons, must be suppressed, made arrangements for a two-night exhibition of educational films, and in the usual manner of business mention was made to the fire insurance broker. He immediately raised the obstacle of which I speak in front of the reverend gentleman. The church, by the way, is insured for $150,000 in several companies, who divide the risk. The broker immediately said: "If you are going to install this moving picture machine we must ask an extra rate of 15 cents on the thousand dollars insured. In addition to this, the old rate will have to be readjusted to carry out the requirements of the Fire Insurance Exchange." When the figures were carefully gone over it brought the risk for this one church to a very much higher rating, by which the trustees would have to pay an extra $300 to $400 per year. For the use of the machine for two nights the rate of insurance would be $10, this covering the risk for two nights' entertainment.

I was always under the impression that if the Board of Fire Underwriters and the inspector from the Board of Gas, Water and Electricity, had examined and passed the machine and its installation, all was saisfactory, and I brought this prominently before the broker. I also rang up two insurance companies, who told me that they were willing to waive their indemnity clause on due presentation of facts from the minister, giving the dates of the entertainments and also complying with the rules of the Department through their inspectors. Other insurance companies were not agreeable to make this concession, and so complications are the result.

The questions arising in my mind are: Do the manufacturers of machines thoroughly understand this condition of affairs? Do the exchange men who rent machines for special functions at churches know that they are violating a law of the New York Fire Exchange? I know for a fact of many instances where a moving picture machine has been installed for special occasions and no thought of the fire insurance policy has been taken. Supposing that, by some means, a fire had occurred, would the church trustees be able to collect the insurance under such conditions?

Every man in the industry knows that the risk of a properly equipped projecting machine with films is infinitesimally small compared with the vast risks carried on other occasions. For instance, it was my province to attend a bazaar in one of the largest churches in the city, and when I looked around at the flimsy material used for decorating this same hall and the vast amount of celluloid toys that were in this bazaar, together with the flimsy dresses of the attendants, who for one whole week were in a position of extreme risk of fire, because both open gas jets and electricity were in use, the thought occurred to me: I wonder what would happen if some careless smoker threw a lighted match among the flimsy muslins around here? Strange to say, several gentlemen were smoking, and a calamity was averted by the merest chance. I had in mind the bazaar in Paris, which was the cause of so many lives being lost a few years ago owing to the carelessness of a smoker throwing a lighted match into a basket of film. This was in the days when take-ups were unknown and the film ran loosely into an open basket or box.

Another question in my mind is: Why do the fire insurance companies allow such conditions to exist in bazaars and put such restricted conditions upon the use of the Cinematograph? Is it not time for every manufacturer of a moving picture machine to call a meeting and interview the New York Fire Exchange, placing before the authorities at the head of this exchange the safety devices and the whole condition of working of the various machines and get a ruling upon the subject to which everyone will conform?

Educational films are coming more and more in vogue, and, if restrictions are preventing their use, what can be done? The school and the home are beginning to use these films. Machines are on the market suitable for both home and school use, carrying, some of them, toy films, others of a scientific nature; some small films, and others the regular commercial subjects. Manufacturers are desirous of selling their machines to prospective clients, and if they are to be handicapped by restrictive legislation on account of the fire laws the fire laws must be made, or endeavored to be made, to conform with present everyday conditions. I raise this warning note for the good of the industry and am desirous of seeing quick action taken to break down all harassing conditions that will tend in any way to hinder the progress of the educational work.

INDIANA MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE

November 28, 1912.

Editor, Moving Picture News,
New York, N. Y

Dear Sir:—

I am enclosing a pamphlet that we are distributing all over Indianapolis to each theatre individually.

It is our determination to so instill the good of motion pictures to our patrons and the public in general, and to let people know what we are doing so that we can get public sentiment our way.

Indianapolis exhibitors are harassed continuously and it certainly is a great and necessary duty that the exhibitors all over the country unite in one common cause.

The so-called legitimate theatres here are stirring up all this trouble.

We are requested to have a permit for every child under fourteen years of age to enter a picture show.

It is a disgrace and indignity upon the people and upon the exhibitors who are showing the pictures.

I hope that you may be able to make use of some of this in your columns so as to let every exhibitor know how his interests are and how they stand.

Very cordially yours.

T. J. REMBUSCH,
State Secretary, M. P. E. L.

The Indiana Exhibitors will meet December 10th at the headquarters of Indianapolis Local No. 1. the Sax Building. Room 410, promptly at 10 a.m. at which time they will elect officers for the ensuing year and transact other business that may come up before the convention.

* * * *

The following is the pamphlet referred to in the above letter:

To the Friends and Patrons of Motion Pictures:

A city ordinance requires all motion picture theatres to refuse admission to all children under fourteen years of age unless accompanied by parent or guardian, or unless so accompanied by some other person over twenty-one years of age who shall have authority in writing thereof.

Class Legislation. Many Indianapolis attorneys claim that this ordinance is class legislation, because its operation allows a child under fourteen years of age to go unaccompanied to any and all other places of amusement, while a motion picture theatre has a restriction whereby a child under fourteen years of age must be accompanied by parent, guardian or a written permission which must be presented to the box office of the theatre.

Indianapolis motion picture managers protest, and feel that the enforcement of this law is Class Legislation, reflects on the high class of entertainment presented by motion picture theatres, and places a stigma and indignity on the personnel of those exhibiting motion pictures and the patrons who attend.

We claim that motion pictures are the greatest help to the most people, are better in moral character and value than any entertainment ever given to mankind. We desire to present the case on actual facts, and solicit the sympathy, help and co-operation of our friends and patrons that these continual unjust attacks be eliminated.

A test case was made. Our secretary, Dr. J. M. Rhoades, was arrested for a violation of this ordinance, and Judge Leathers, sitting as special judge, decided in favor of the exhibitors on the ground of Class Legislation Judge Leathers was for many years on the bench of the Superior Court.

The city attorney appealed the case, and Judge Remster overruled the demurrer on November 8th. In other words, Judge Remster held the ordinance valid, making it unlawful to allow a child under fourteen years of age to attend an exhibition of motion pictures unaccompanied by parent, guardian or written permission, but legal for the same child unaccompanied to attend any other form of amusement, Wild West shows, side shows, burlesque shows—in fact, anything—no matter what the performance might be.

The case will now be carried to the Supreme Court. In the meantime we must comply with the law, even though it will be a great hardship to our business and an inconvenience to the patrons of our theatres. We further ask that the public assist us in complying with this law, even though it is unreasonable, because we feel in time justice will prevail.

The character and quality of motion picture films has increased a hundred-fold in the last three years and is still advancing. Our great popularity causes other factions to continually harass us until we find it necessary to defend ourselves.

Every film shown in Indianapolis must first pass the National Board of Censorship and five other boards of censure. It is impossible to present a film in a theatre in Indianapolis; demoralizing, simply because there is none to be had.

Miss Kate Davis came to Indianapolis last spring and by press notice and agitation started a crusade against motion picture theatres. She caused many of our friends to believe that there were demoralizing films shown. We were particularly anxious to retain the good will of those interested in the moral welfare and uplift and we called a meeting at the Y. M. C. A. assembly room, and representatives of all churches and societies were present with moving picture exhibitors. It was conclusively shown at this meeting that the exhibition of motion pictures is not demoralizing—in fact, not a person in that vast assembly could cite one concrete instance where and when a motion picture was shown that was demoralizing What better proof can we present than evidence? We believe that it does not injure a child to go into a motion picture show any more than upon the streets, the business houses, the schools, or anywhere. The result of this meeting was that many people who had never attended are now our friends, who would have been inclined to think ill of us on account of an agitator We desire the patronage of everyone and the investigation of any fair-minded person.

The greatest men and women on the stage appear in motion pictures—Bernhardt, Goodwin, Taliaferro—all are with us.

Presidents, rulers, kings, princes, bishops honor us by their presence with us in film form every day. Our weekly current events give you the work and progress of the world.

The best thoughts in history, poetry, literature, music, art and science are depicted on the screen more impressive than lips or books can portray.

Our friends are in every walk of life. Rich and poor, scholar and student, business and labor, young and old—are our friends. They come for entertainment, relief from worry, for mental and physical rest, for change of thought, and information. While the high cost of living has entered every other avenue, we have lowered the cost of entertainment and lifted high the character of same, in that way helping us all to bear the strain.

Elbert Hubbard says, "In the motion picture theatre we find true democracy." We go in and out as we please and sit anywhere—no decollete, silk hat or conventionality worry us. It is truly a place where the whole human family gather, and as they watch the silent drama, each learning over again life's story, we must feel that this wholesome, elevating entertainment truly exemplifies the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man.

China had books and missionaries for centuries, but when the motion picture told the story of liberty and justice, a republic was born. The public schools are using motion pictures to educate the young mind. Churches have seen fit to place our machines in their sanctuary, which we think speaks well.

EXTRACT FROM INDIANAPOLIS NEWS, OCTOBER 29

Movies Hurt the Saloons—District of Columbia's Liquor Bill Is Decreasing Rapidly

Washington, October 29—Statistics gathered by the District of Columbia excise board during the last year indicate a heavy decrease in the sale of intoxicants in the district. Liquor dealers say the moving picture shows are the form of recreation sought in large measure by men who formerly made some favorite saloon their club resort where they met friends for a social evening. It is pointed out that the amount formerly paid for a round of drinks in a saloon for a party of friends is sufficient to pay the admission price for an entire family into two or more moving picture shows.

Some Things the Motion Picture Theatres Have Done for Indianapolis

1. Through the Citizens Charity Organization, composed exclusively of Indianapolis motion picture managers, we have distributed over 300 tons of coal to the poor and needy of Indianapolis.

2. Maintained a home for the poor and penniless for three years at 1503 Columbia avenue.

3. Placed the sum of $75 per week in the hands of Mrs. Gertrude E. Oakes, matron of the City Dispensary, for the use of the poor and needy.

4. Donated $75 to the Juvenile Court for paying expenses of conference in Indianapolis.

5. Donated $50 to Boys' Club.

6. Honored every request of the Humane Society of the city of Indianapolis in regard to the welfare of children.

7. Donated $100, $50 at a time to Aid Society to buy ice for poor

8. Met with ministers, charity workers and representatives of civic organizations at the Y. M. C. A., 1912, and welcomed inspection and investigation as to the moral tone of all motion picture theatres in Indianapolis.

9. Given the Y. M. C. A. of the city of Indianapolis free use of curtain advertising in all motion picture theatres in Indianapolis.

In short, our charity is a real one, going direct to the needy and amounts to from $5,000 to $10,000 a year.

10. The American Tobacco Company submitted a proposition to Indianapolis exhibitors to redeem cigarette coupons as admission to theatres as a very advantageous commission This proposition was flatly refused by the motion picture exhibitors as belittling their exhibitions and inconsistent with good morals.

FINIS

We feel that this is a record that any business enterprise may rightly be proud of, and in view of the continual agitation we feel the public should know what we are doing. If you believe our cause is just, give us your moral support in obtaining equal rights for all and special privilege for none. We invite investigation.

MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS OF INDIANAPOLIS.

M. P. E. LEAGUE OF AMERICA

Special Points for Exhibitors

Last Saturday, the very last day of November, 1912, there occurred a business consultation in rooms 1708 and 1709 in the Hotel La Salle which meant much, very much, to the moving picture interests in general and to the city of Chicago and the State of Illinois in particular.

By 10 o'clock on the morning mentioned there had arrived from their home cities M. A. Neff, National President, Cincinnati, Ohio; C. M. Christenson, National Secretary, Cleveland, Ohio; C. H. Philips, Milwaukee, National Vice-President for Wisconsin, and Associate Counsel the Hon. John J. Lentz, Columbus, Ohio.

Letters had been written to the following Chicago exhibitors, who were promptly "on the job":

W. J. Sweeney, National Vice-President for Illinois; Robert J. Levy, L. H. Frank, C. L. Hull, C. A. Anderson, Fred W. Schaefer, I. Natkin, Samuel Katz, Sidney Smith, George Henry and A. Balaban. Mr. George Henry is State President of Illinois League No. 2.

As a result of the meeting, Chicago and Illinois will be thoroughly organized throughout, as any and all differences that may have existed before were amicably adjusted, and every participant in the meeting went home enthused with the good work accomplished. Every municipality in the State will shortly be working under its charter from the State League, and as a starter, a local league will be organized by the Illinois State League officers at Murphysboro on the 12th inst. At this meeting there will be present National President M. A. Neff and National Vice-President Wm. J. Sweeney, together with a delegation of Chicago exhibitors.

The one burning question just now among all normal moving picture interests is, "What can legally be done to curb the insane desire to beat the little fellow out by the big or regular vaudeville houses, which are now practising the murderous custom of giving (in some instances) as many as five vaudeville acts and sometimes seven reels of pictures for a dime?"

At best this thing can only be temporary, for the lives of too many small though good picture shows, members of the National League of Exhibitors, are at stake for the parent body to remain idle in the premises. The unrest evidenced all over the country in local leagues is ominous, and some kind of regulation is inevitable.

A few days ago, in Cleveland, Ohio, the local took up this very proposition, I am informed by National Secretary Christenson, who, in company with that old moving picture war horse, National President M. A. Neff, has just completed a lengthy conference on the legal phases of the question at the La Salle Hotel, Chicago, ably coached by National Counsel John J. Lentz, and National Vice-President for Wisconsin C. H. Philips, both attorneys of national reputation. "The small exhibitor must and shall be protected in his rights and every means of legal relief within the power of the National will be exhausted to that end," said President Neff and Secretary Christenson with much fervor.

The Moving Picture News is in a position to keep the membership of the League fully posted along the vital lines affecting their interests, and will do so to its fullest capabilities, without hesitancy, without fear and without unjust prejudice.

The State Convention of the Ohio League will convene in Columbus and will remain session during the 21st and 22nd of December. The banner gathering of this wide-awake State League is confidently expected and much important business has been mapped out by the State officers. It is only necessary to say that Mr. Neff is Ohio's State President to be justified in predicting anything but a Quaker prayer-meeting at the coming Columbus session.

Upon the same dates and in the same city there will be held an important meeting of the National Executive Committee. This body comprises all of the National Vice-Presidents from each State in America in the jurisdiction of the National League, and great questions of national import are sure to come up and be disposed of in the proper and legal manner usual with bodies of men of the caliber of these gentlemen. National Vice-President P. Le Marquand, Winnipeg, Canada, writes that he will be present.

By its rapid evolution from a toddling baby to an executive and demonstrative giant in three years, the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America, at least metaphorically, has "taken the breath" of the theatrical world at large. Born under most adverse conditions, without even a midwife present, its little cry for recognition was scarce heard by the few heroes present. But they took the weak, wee bairn to their hearts, and by careful watchfulness (from fear of kidnappers) it has been fed and nurtured until now, ye gods! Before many moons shall have come and gone this already mammoth organization will be limited in membership only by the confines of this entire continent—all Americas and the Dominion of Canada—each State will have its league and each city and town its local—all working for and insisting upon having its just due—as President Neff so aptly and forcibly says, "A square deal to every exhibitor."

Organization is the only hope of successful and permanent existence and manly independence, and the one best bet of the moving picture showman is quick affiliation with the National League, where his every cry for justice will be listened to by willing ears, and anxious hands be ever outstretched in his behalf against all abridgments of his rights.

GREAT NORTHERN FEATURE

A drama enacted on board a burning steamship in mid-ocean is promised in the latest two-reel feature of the Great Northern Special Feature Film Co., which is to be known as "The Great Ocean Disaster, or Peril of Fire." It is said to be an exceptionally thrilling picture and one that is so far out of the ordinary that it is sure to hold attention. There are fifty big scenes in the two reels and each one of these is replete with sensation. There is a real steamship afire in mid-ocean and hundreds of passengers who indulge in a wild scramble for the lifeboats when the officers of the vessel find it impossible longer to withhold knowledge of the danger which threatens.

Interwoven in the thrilling drama of disaster at sea, is a love story between Frank Harvey, a young music hall entertainer, and Mary, the daughter of the captain of the ill-fated vessel. The magic wireless apparatus is brought into play with the result that another steamship arrives in time to rescue the imperiled passengers. In the excitement, however, Frank and Mary are overlooked and find themselves alone aboard the burning steamship. The unique manner of their rescue is said to form another series of thrilling scenes. In the end the lovers are seen clasped in each other's embrace on the deck of the rescue ship while nearby the burning liner belches volumes of dense smoke and lurid flames.

NEW ERA MOTION PICTURE PLAN

The New Era Motion Picture Plan was founded for the purpose of injecting new impetus into the propagation of the educational film. Under the direction of Leon J. Rubinstein a corps of camera men have begun to execute his plans, which call for a great deal that is novel and unusual in the educational line. It is not the beginning of a new order of things for Mr. Rubinstein because he has been very successful in the securing of such subjects; the most notable among these were the picture showing the United States Government making paper money at Washington, which was released during the summer by the Imp. Also another Imp release called "Presidential Possibilities," in which were rounded up all of the great statesmen who were in line for the presidential nomination by the various political parties.

"I am a firm believer in the future of the educational film and from my analysis of the situation the moving picture industry has just about been nibbling the edge of the enormous bun which lies at our disposal to feed on. In the course of my work I have discussed this phase of the film situation with some of the most noted educators in the country, and the opinion is unanimous that the moving picture is the mind's eye of the twentieth century—the teacher, not of the future, but rightfully of the present.

"It is with a view to helping set the educational film on the pinnacle where it belongs that I have outlined a course of work which will embrace a wide and varied activity ranging from the commercial science of the world to its institutional and philanthropic pursuits.

"I desire emphatically to be segregated from the class of men who, in the possession of a camera, are drumming to death every national advertiser in the land. I shall not undertake to place at the disposal of any advertiser the circulation of the moving picture theatres and I feel in accord with the exhibitors when they resent being thus exploited.

"Whatever subjects are embraced in the work of the New Era Motion Picture Plan will be made purely from the standpoint of and for exhibition to the layman, simplifying scientific progress so that humanity may understand and applaud."

The New Era Motion Picture Plan has opened its office at 145 West Forty-fifth street and the activity there well denotes Mr. Rubinstein's faith in his proposition.

THE VENGEANCE OF THE FAKIR

(Eclair Two-reel Release, December 19th)

The above production is not only unique in subject, but is well produced. How the East Indian atmosphere has been conjured up on the screen by means of stage props, appropriate sets, and splendidly chosen scenic locations from God's out-of-doors is a marvel. It is without a doubt one of the best things that Eclair has done. The uniform of the British soldiers in India as represented in the picture has been pronounced by some critics to be incorrect, white or khaki being usually worn by the British troops in India. This, of course, to the unpractised eye would scarcely be noticeable, if at all. It would be well, however, in so splendid a production to strive for absolute authenticity in all points.

The story has been produced with the following talented cast:

Part I.

Captain Sneade .....Mr. Francis
The Fakir .....Mr. Sheerer
A Hindu Priest.....Mr. Larkin
Mrs. Sneade .....Miss Bright
Lucy .....Miss Muriel

Part II.

Colonel Sneade .....Mr. Francis
Captain Mulvaney .....Mr. Johnstone
The Hindu .....Mr. Paul Bourgeois
Mrs. Mulvaney .....Miss Stuart
Miss Aline Mulvaney.....Miss Hume
Miss Sneade .....Miss Bright

Captain Sneade, of the British Army, leading a battalion of soldiers through a Hindu village, finds the road obstructed by a fakir who is lying prostrate upon the ground. The Captain orders him to move aside, but the fakir remains deaf to the request. Exasperated the soldier strikes him with his whip, compelling him to get out of the way, and the men disappear at a gallop.

The fakir enters the Temple during prayers and relates to the priests the story of the outrage upon his person by the British captain. They decide upon a plan of vengeance.

One night not long afterward Captain Sneade and his wife have kissed their baby son good-night and have retired to the living-room below for a brief rest. Suddenly a tiger is seen to bound into the child's room, place himself like a sentinel on guard until the two guards have carried off the little one, then quietly follow them out into the night. It was the Sacred Tiger of the tribe.

Hearing a noise above, the parents, startled, run quickly up the stairs, and find their baby gone. The Captain dashes out in pursuit, but soon loses the trail of the kidnappers.

Time passes on. The child is brought up in the service of the priests, in the Temple not far from his father's home.

Each morning he is taught to anoint his entire body with a perfumed herb-stain, believing, as he had been instructed, that he was performing a religious rite.

Years go by and Khemi, as the stolen boy has been named, who is now a grown young man, falls in love with the daughter of a captain of the British Army. Aline is forbidden to see Khemi any more, but still she finds his floral offering on her window-sill every morning.

Khemi, going through the forest one day, perceives Aline, who seemingly having lost her way while on a hunt with some friends, is being pursued by a leopard. Khemi rushes after them. The young woman is just about able to reach the hunting lodge and shut herself up with the keeper; but the beast, thwarted, is furious—must have its prey and attempts to batter down the door of the little hut.

Khemi rushes after, throws himself upon the beast and after a terrific struggle is successful in getting him outside. Aline now comes to his rescue—she hands the young man her revolver. He fires at the leopard and wounds him mortally. The beast is about to crawl away and Khemi, in an attempt to follow, falls exhausted after the fierce combat. With an effort he rises to his knees, takes a last shot at the retreating animal and kills it.

Khemi's wounds are being washed and the startling discovery is made that the Hindu is in reality a white man.

When the priests come to claim their own they are held up by the Colonel—he suspects there is something wrong, and with his revolver pointed at the head of the fakir insists on the truth, finally wringing from him the confession: "Khemi is your own son—I stole him in revenge."

And so the story, which began as a tragedy, ends happily. The young couple are married and everything goes well.

BEAUTIFUL ITALA FEATURE—$25 OFFERED FOR APPROPRIATE TITLE

At the Film Supply Co.'s projection room during the past week was exhibited one of the finest states rights propositions that has appeared since Nat C. Goodwin appeared in Dickens' "Oliver Twist."

This splendid effort from the Itala Film Co. was produced at a cost of some $15,000. The title under which it appeared at the press review was "Father." This title, thought by the firm not quite appropriate, another name is to be sought for it, which will convey more accurately the intention of the story, and for the best choice is offered a twenty-five dollar prize.

Ermete Zacconi, the marvelously talented actor who has lent himself to the interpretation in pictures of this interesting story, was the successor of Salvini, and is considered to be the greatest living Italian dramatic actor. He, an honored member of Elenora Duse's company, and now wealthy with this world's goods, lives in retirement on his large estate at Bologna. This is his first appearance in pictures, and let us hope that it may not be his last, for such splendid dramatic pantomime has rarely been seen in pictures up to date.

The story is written around an old manufacturer whose factory has been burned through an agent of his competitor. The old man is suspected of destroying the manufactory himself, is thrown into prison, and his little daughter, unknown to him, is adopted by his competitor to try to appease a guilty conscience. When the old man escapes he wanders about in the garb of a rag-picker, and appears in the haunts of men of that class. He is told that his daughter is dead. He meets by accident with the man who actually set fire to the factory, and who has kept the card with Marny's name and the order to destroy the building written on it, using it at different times to extract money from Marny, the wicked competitor. Tonio falls asleep in the rag-keeper's haunt and drops the card, which is picked up by "Old Andrew" Vivanti, who goes at once to the house of the man who has not only injured him but confiscated his daughter. The old man is shown the son of Marny making love to his daughter in the garden, and rather than interfere with her happiness, he promises to remain unknown to her forever.

Broken in spirit and heart, he wanders off from his native city, but looking back, he sees a great fire raging. The thought of his daughter causes him to hurry to the scene, which is the house of Marny, set fire to by Tonio in a drunken rage. The old man, rushing into the burning house, finds all safe save Marny himself. Making his way to the rooms above, he rescues the wicked competitor, who dies shortly afterward, but not until he has made known the identity of the old man.

HOCHSTETTER UTILITY COMPANY CONTRACT WITH RUSSIAN SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

One of the largest and most important steps in connection with the silent drama has been taken by the Hochstetter Utility Company in contracting with the Russian Symphony Orchestra, of which Modest Altschuler is director.

On Friday evening, December 13th, the splendid production by the above mentioned company, and which has already had favorable mention in the columns of the

F. W. HOCHSTETTER—MODEST ALTSCHULER

This combination was recently brought about by Mr. F. W. Hochstetter and Modest Altschuler combining music and drama in photo plastic effect with natural colors. The music is drawn from the compositions of the great masters and has been adapted to this subject. The performance is very unique as the music practically takes the place of the speech and expresses the motion pictures most vividly, educational in its allegorical studies, historical in its settings and characters, philosophical in its treatise and classic in its portrayal. Mr. F. W. Hochstetter, who, after sixteen years of labor, has accomplished this foremost startling achievement discovered in the realms of photography since the days of the daguerreotype. Mr. Hochstetter produces plastic figures, luminous lights, stereoscopic effect and natural colors.

This is the first time in the history of the moving picture in America that it has been placed on a footing with the musical drama, in dignity and art with the most artistic on the producing end, and the best that New York has to offer on the musical end. The exhibition cannot fail to be a triumph for the motion picture industry.

For some time past the Moving Picture News has advocated through its columns the proper musical accompaniment for the pictures, Mr. Ernst Luz having contributed to its columns methods for easy accompaniment. It is with pleasure that we realize our ideals in the splendid demonstration that the Hochstetter Utility Company are about to give the public.

BATTLE OF THE LONG SAULT

First Production of the British American Film Mfg. Co.

Briam is the registered name of the films manufactured by the British American Film Manufacturing Co., Ltd., of Montreal, Can., and the "Battle of the Long Sault," their first production, will be released almost immediately. The countless stirring episodes in the history of North America of several centuries ago furnish the material for the first Briam picture play turned out and their claim to superiority over the general run of pictures is justified when the coming releases are seen.

Actual Indians are shown, thoroughbred descendants of the Iroquois who terrorized the early French and English settlers when the redskins greatly outnumbered the white men in the country. The moving picture men found in the inhabitants of the Indian village of Caughnawaga, near Montreal, natural born actors who took to their parts in the scenes with great readiness. The long faces, the high cheekbones and the stern lines of their forefathers are sharply defined in these people, who have intermingled with no white races since the advent of the latter to this country. They are totally different and infinitely superior to painted white men or half-breeds for the moving picture producer. Many of the Indian costumes, feathered headpieces, spears, tomahawks, bows and arrows, etc., necessary for the Briam pictures were furnished by these players themselves, who had inherited them from their forefathers through many generations.

STAFF AND PLAYERS OF BRITISH-AMERICAN FILM MFG. CO.
Taken at Briam Camp, near Montreal, Canada.

The pictures which are now being released are the result of the company's work during the past summer at the Briam camp at Johnstone's Point on the banks of the St. Lawrence River opposite Lachine, near Mount Royal. The advent of cold weather and snow has driven the company to their large and modernly equipped studio in Montreal, though excursions are frequently made to their camp for the taking of winter scenes. Though hindered by lack of sunshine during the summer and autumn, a great deal of good work was accomplished at the Briam camp before the winter set in. Scenes were taken in many stories of Indian love and war, of the Hudson Bay Company, of the struggle the early settlers had for existence, etc.

The setting for the majority of these scenes was found in the large tract of government owned land on the banks of the St. Lawrence on which the British American Film Mfg. Co., Ltd., has secured a twenty-year lease. Here, every variety of scenery desired is right at hand. Acres of virgin forest unspoiled by man, stretches of rocky country bordering on the river, sandy beaches, rivers and streams are in abundance. When a church, an old blockhouse or an old stone residence is required in a setting, many such are found in Chateauguay, Lachine or other of the nearby villages. An Indian village of wigwams, tepees, and huts of rushes and reeds laid out on the Briam property. Real old-fashioned log cabins were erected with stone chimneys. A feature about one of these mud-chinked cabins is a removable roof for the admitting of light to facilitate the taking of interior scenes. Farther back in the woods a stockade was erected which figures prominently in the "Battle of the Long Sault," the first release. These erections combined with the cabins and bunk-houses of the company, make a small village at Johnstone's Point.

The Briam studio in Montreal is a large three-story building well suited to the purpose. Here pictures will be produced all winter by artificial light, though in the near future a sun studio will be added. A permanent company of players has been secured under the direction of capable producers, and it is the intention to shortly release two Briam pictures weekly. The camera men are the best obtainable and the films are remarkable for their clearness and wealth of detail. The executive offices of the British American Film Mfg. Co., Ltd., are in the New Birks Building, Phillips Square, Montreal.

From the horrors of Indian warfare to the touching Indian love stories that tradition has handed down is a far cry. Briam pictures have a great educational value in that they picture the manners and customs of the early inhabitants of this country as they really were, and picture these people under all circumstances of peace and war. The country this company is operating in is typical of all the great northern wilds and admirably suitable for tales of the Hudson Bay Company's fur traders and the Northwest Mounted Police. The landing of Champlain in America is one event the Briam people propose staging. Included among the picture plays they will release in the near future are: "The Battle of the Long Sault," "Indian Love," "The Long Traverse, or the Trail of the White Beaver," "Spirit of the Lily," "Indian Brutus, or the Battle of the Tribes," and the "Papoose's First Christmas."

A synopsis of "The Battle of the Long Sault," which is the first Briam release, is as follows:

Chevalier Dufresne, a follower of Champlain, visiting Ville Marie, Montreal, falls in love with Marie Le Bond when introduced to her by the priest after mass. When he asks for her hand in marriage she tells him to see her father, the village justice. He does so but is doubtfully received, as the justice fears that a chevalier soldier of fortune would make but sorry providence for his daughter. He tells Dufresne to go into the woods and show that he can make his way. Agreeing to this character test, Dufresne sets off into the forest to trap.

Two weeks later, upon coming near where he has hidden his canoe in the rushes, he sees a fleet of Indians headed toward Ville Marie. They land near him and make camp for the night. He overhears them plan to destroy the village and, under cover of darkness, lifts his canoe and paddles furiously toward Ville Marie. Arriving as the villagers are assembling for early mass, he warns them and falls fainting in the arms of Marie. Dollard des Ormeaux, realizing the danger, calls for volunteers to go with him to meet the Indians on the way and do what they can to stop them. Sixteen brave men are ready and they enter the church, make their wills, and receive the last Sacrament before setting out. When Dufresne regains consciousness and learns of their departure, he rushes to the friendly Algonquin camp nearby and secures forty-three volunteers and paddles with them after Dollard. An abandoned stockade on an island in the river is fortified by Dollard and Dufresne and their men. While they are at work the lookout on the river comes running to tell them of the approach of the Iroquois. They ambush themselves and fire on the Indians as they paddle down the river and then retreat to the stockade.

Soon the wood is full of painted savages, and noting the handful of defenders, they storm the stockade but are driven back with great slaughter. Again and again they charge but are repulsed. Finally the Iroquois retreat and hold a powwow and decide to ram the gate with a trunk of a tree and under cover of the smoke of burning embers and flaming arrows they charge. The defenders realize that they cannot hope to hold out much longer and Dollard orders an arquebus made into a bomb. They load it to the muzzle, but in throwing it over the stockade it strikes the top of the gate and falling inside, explodes, killing many of the defenders. The friendly Algonquins meanwhile, seeing the hopelessness of the fight, have one by one deserted, climbing over the stockade and joining the Iroquois.

The exploding arquebus partly destroys the gate, making an entrance through which the savages pour, killing and scalping all the survivors. They realize the terrible slaughter this small band has wrought, though, and decide that to take Ville Marie would be too costly. So the Iroquois turn about and proceed up the river. Days after the news of the glorious deaths of the seventeen heroes reaches Ville Marie. They had succeeded in their attempt to turn back the Iroquois. Their wives were left to mourn their loss and Marie mourns the death of Chevalier Dufresne.

THE NEW CENTURY FILM SERVICE, ENGLAND

The representative of the above company, Mr. J. Wild, is at present on this side of the Atlantic looking out for good feature film productions that he may represent for his company in England. Mr. Wild, up to the present, has been in the U. S. A. in the neighborhood of three weeks, enjoying himself looking over the immensity of "God's Own Country," about which he expresses himself in terms of wonder and amazement, so much so that he feels inclined, like all Englishmen, to take up his residence here. Of this we may have more to say in a later issue. Any manufacturer may communicate with Mr. Wild at 722 Benedict avenue, Woodhaven, Long Island, or care Moving Picture News.

"Bernie," who has been at the head of the Republic Film Company and made this company what it was (before it changed its name to the International Educational Film Company), has resigned from these companies to take up a position with the Monopol Company, who are going to make three reel subjects of plays, and book stories, featuring in these reels Marion Leonard and her husband (Stanner E. On the afternoon of Monday, November 25th, at the Belasco Theatre, Washington, President Taft with members of his family and official staff, saw the first showing of the greatest motion picture series ever made—"Panama, the Earth Divided, the World United"—all caught by the ever-active Kinemacolor camera.

On Friday afternoon the exhibition was repeated at special meeting of the National Geographic Society at their official home in Washington.

Rear-Admiral Colby M. Chester, of the United States Navy, spoke while the motion-color pictures were on the screen, and explained some of the possibilities of the Isthmian project from a naval viewpoint.

NEW EDISON PHONOGRAPH EXHIBITED BEFORE MODERN HISTORIC RECORDS ASSOCIATION

On November 29th, at the National Arts Club, No. 14 Gramercy Park, an exhibition was given of the newly perfected Edison phonograph. The occasion was the annual meeting of the Modern Historic Records Association.

In addition to the above interesting demonstration, Mr. McDonald exhibited some "positive" photographs which had been treated by a newly discovered process, rendering them practically permanent. Two that he showed were fifty years old, having been exposed to the light every day without fading. He has presented six of the "positives" to the association for records and will present six every year.

The officers elected at this meeting to serve the coming year were: President, Herbert Bridgman; vice-presidents, George Plympton, Robert Peary, Alexander Konta, Robert C. Morris, Joseph Rowan and Lieutenant Colonel Brainard; secretary, W. T. Larned, and treasurer, E. M. Cravath.

THE WHEEL OF DESTINY

By VIRGINIA WEST

(Adapted from Rex Release)

AT the close of the Civil War Major Cook found himself alone but for his two faithful old negroes, Eph and Chloe.

"Uncle Eph," he said when the old man came in as usual to put coal on the fire, "Uncle Eph, bring Aunt Chloe in. I want to talk to you both."

"Yas, Massa."

The old man shuffled from the room and returned again in a few moments with his wife, Aunt Chloe.

"Sit down," said Major Cook when the two old negroes stood waiting behind his chair. "Sit down where I can see you."

The man and woman sat down, one on each side of the fire.

The old Major remained silent for a while, his head bowed. Then he looked at his servants and spoke:

"The war is over and you two are free to go where you choose. I have no claim on you."

"Oh, Marse Jeems, don' sen' us away," cried Aunt Chloe.

"No, Massa, don't," added Eph.

"You do not understand," said the Major. "You are free. The victory of the North has given you your freedom. Don't you know that?"

"Yassir, all de niggers is talkin' 'bout it. We knows it, but me an' Chloe we don't wanta leave yuh Marse Jeems, we wanta stay wid yuh."

The Major closed his eyes for a moment and coughed before he said in a low voice:

"I must leave the old place. I'll sell it when I can. God knows when that will be unless some Yankee happens to take a fancy to it."

"Is yuh gwine fur 'way?" ventured Aunt Chloe timidly.

"I don't know where I'm going yet."

"But we mus' go 'long, Marse Jeems. We gotter take ker yuh. We'll go any whers wid yuh."

"No, I must go alone."

Old Eph arose and fell on his knees by the Major's chair. "No, no, Marse Jeems! We gotter take ker yuh. Ole Missus tole us to an' we ain't gwine leab yuh."

Aunt Chloe joined her husband and knelt, rocking herself to and fro in her grief. "Yas, Marse Jeems," she moaned, "Ole Mis' said to us jes' 'fore she die; she say, 'kear fer yer Ole Massa.'"

"Yes, I know," said the Major huskily.

"An' young Marse, too——"

Eph stopped as Major Cook raised his hand with a sudden gesture.

The old negro bowed his head, "Yas, Marse Jeems, I know yuh say we wan't t' speak his name," he said, "but I gotter, I gotter do it. Marse Giles say, when he went away, he say wid tears arunnin' down his cheeks he say, 'Ah leabs de Major in yo' han's, Uncle Eph.'"

The Major's hands hung at his sides and his chin rested on his breast.

"Please, Marse Jeems."

"Please, Massa."

A pair of black hands raised each of the Major's hands to a pair of withered lips.

With tears that he no longer tried to control streaming from his eyes, the Major leaned forward in his chair.

"Dear, faithful friends," he said, "I must save you from yourselves. It would be wrong to let you share my poverty when you can both work and make your living. If you wish to go to the North where your son lives I can manage to get you there. Your love for me is blinding you to your own interests. You must trust me to do what is best. Go now, it is getting late. We will make our plans to-morrow."

The old slaves again pressed their trembling lips to their master's hands, and choking down their sobs left the room.

When the door closed Major Cook sank back into his chair and gave himself up to thought. For several years he had not permitted his mind to dwell upon the torturing past, but to-night he gave it full sway.

He thought of his young manhood, of his courtship and marriage; he thought of the birth of his only son, of his childhood and youth, and his leaving home; he thought of the death of his wife, and his own desolation afterward. Through his mind these thoughts went, one upon the other.

But mostly his mind dwelt upon Giles, his only son. How plainly the past came back to him in every detail. How well he remembered that night, shortly before the beginning of the war when Giles came home and was taken to the cabin of Eph and Chloe by the old servant to conceal his condition. That was not the first time or the Major could have forgiven it. Ever since the young man had returned from college he had spent his time gambling and drinking. The proud old Major had been hurt and mortified to the very soul. As far back in his family as he could go there had never been a gambler or a drunkard. He had pleaded with the young man, argued with him, and then demanded, but without effect. At last, when he found him in the cabin, hidden by Eph, he had sent him from home, telling him never to return.

How the two negroes had pleaded for their young master! The father remembered it now with tears in his eyes. Had he done right? He asked himself the question over and over, but the answer never came quite clear.

Now when he looked back upon the scene, it seemed a terrible thing to do—and yet, after all, perhaps it had helped the boy to make a man of himself. The father prayed to God that it had.

In the days that followed the night of reminiscences, Major Cook made arrangements for his two servants to go North where they had a son living. The parting was hard for both the master and the servants, but their faith in each other was strong.

The Major left his estate in the hands of lawyers and went to a Southern city to spend what seemed to him the last few years of his life.

Uncle Eph and Aunt Chloe went to New York to their son, but when they found that he had to walk up two flights of stairs to reach his house they declared that they would find a cabin.

So the search began, and stopped only when they had rented a three-roomed cabin standing alone in the middle of some lots.

The charming manners of the old negro won him many friends, and it was not long before he had a position as a street-cleaner.

Slowly the years passed by until the two woolly heads were turning white. They had much to occupy their thoughts and time, but the memory of "Ole Marse Jeems" never dimmed. Many an evening they sat together by their kitchen fire and talked of the past, and always Aunt Chloe's apron and Uncle Eph's bandanna were wet when they arose to go to bed.

Each night, as regularly as they arose from their chairs, Uncle Eph said earnestly, "Gawd bress Marse Jeems and Marse Giles whereber dey is," and Aunt Shloe answered "Amen."

One morning before Eph started for work he said, "Ole 'oman, how much we got in de jar?"

"Ah don' jes' know, but ah reckon 'bout fi' dollahs."

"Dat's gwine buy us some fine Thanksgivin' rashons."

Then the old man went to his work. The next day was Thanksgiving and he worked cheerfully in spite of the sadness he always carried in the bottom of his heart.

As he worked along shoveling away a light snow that had fallen during the night, and crooning to himself an old plantation song, he saw an elderly man slip and fall upon the pavement.

Uncle Eph was at his side in a moment, with his hand on his elbow.

"Let me hep' yuh, suh," he said.

"Thank you, Uncle. You haven't lost your manners since you came North, have you?" was the reply.

"My old Massa war a gent'mun, suh" was all the old darkey said, but his tone caused the gentleman he had assisted to look at him squarely.

"Ephraim!" he exclaimed

"Oh, Marse Jeems, Marse Jeems, Gawd be praise'."

In a moment the negro was upon his knees raining tears and kisses upon his old master's hand.

"Whar yuh cum frum, Marse Jeems?" he asked, when he could think coherently.

"I've been here several years," said the Major, "but I have never seen you before."

It took little persuasion to get the old Major to Eph's home. By the time they reached the cabin, the darkey was calm enough to see that the Major was thin and worn, and his clothes almost threadbare. He said nothing, but secretly emptied the jar that held the money for the Thanksgiving dinner.

Having left the Major alone Eph made his way as quickly as possible to a clothing store.

When he returned he found Aunt Chloe on her knees, rocking to and fro in an ecstasy too great for words.

When Uncle Eph returned to the place where he had left his shovel and cart, they were not there. He was informed that they had been taken to the street-cleaning station.

Once there it took a very short time for him to learn that the job was no longer his. He had left it during hours.

Crestfallen the old negro shuffled along the street, wondering. Suddenly a sign caught his attention "Turkey raffle, 5 cents a chance." He felt in his pockets. But one nickel could he find. Well, he'd try his luck. He did. But he found he hadn't any.

Now he was without money and without turkey. He was desperate. Mechanically his feet turned homeward. Maybe Chloe could think of a way.

Eph passed a high board fence, and heard a sound that caused him to stop. It was a crow. Where there is a crow there might be a gobble, thought the old man, and made his way to the top of the fence. Then he stopped. No, he couldn't steal for Marse Jeems. Marse Jeems wouldn't want that.

He slid to the ground and found himself in the clutches of a policeman.

Explanations and pleadings were vain, and heartbroken, Uncle Eph was led to the police station.

"What is your name?" asked the judge.

"Ephraim Cook." answered Eph, without looking up:

"Raise your head," cried the judge, in a voice that made the old darkey look up with a start.

The judge was leaning far over the desk, and gazing intently into Uncle Eph's face.

"What is this man charged with, officer?" he asked, not taking his eyes from the black features.

"I have every reason to believe he was about to steal a chicken, your Honor."

To the surprise of all present the judge laughed.

"Marse Giles!" cried the negro. "Ah knows yer smile. Ah'd aknow'd it anywhers!"

"Dear old Uncle Eph," said the judge, reaching across the desk and laying both hands on the old man's shoulders.

"You knows I ain't never stealed nothin', Marse Giles. Ah, kin 'splane it to you."

The matter was explained sufficiently, and in a short while the judge and the old servant were being driven rapidly uptown, stopping only long enough to buy a Thanksgiving dinner.

"Do you know what I am going to do Uncle Eph?" asked Giles. "I am going to come to-morrow and help you and Aunt Chloe eat this dinner."

Giles' thoughts were on his father, but somehow he could not bring himself to ask the question that would tell him whether he should ever see him alive in this world.

Aunt Chloe met them at the cabin door, and took Giles into her arms as though she were still his mammy and he a little boy.

"Yuh ain't t' come in Marse Giles, 'less yuh promise not t' be too s'prised." said Chloe with an attempt at tact.

Giles put his hand on the door frame to steady himself. "You mean—you mean—my father?"

"Yas, Marse Giles."

The old Major had heard and came forward tremblingly. "My boy, my boy." he murmured, brokenly, as he took him in his arms.

"No, father," said Giles, "not your boy. I am a man, and I thank you for it."

"Then you forgive my harsh treatment?"

"Yes, a thousand times. It was that that brought me to my senses. Now I am fit to care for you, and for these two faithful friends."

"It seem like Gawd am gibbin' us mighty nigh mo' gladness den we kin hol' in one day," said Aunt Chloe, as she put away the Thanksgiving turkey.

CAMERA MEN ON JOB AS LUBINS SAIL FOR EUROPE

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

The Expert Opinion of Horace Vinton

WE present to you, following the statements of Editor C. B. Hoadley, the expert opinion of Horace Vinton. We say expert advisedly. Before entering the profession of Cinematography, Mr. Vinton was a vaudeville headliner, and is the author of a score of successful vaudeville sketches and playlets. In moving picturedom Vinton has served many companies successfully as director, script writer and script editor. He writes on the subject of "schools." His assertions should be accorded serious consideration by our readers. His communication:

> Of the many offenders which infest the great Cinematography industry, the "schools," the "associations," and the individuals that are daily springing into prominence, who advertise to teach the art of scenario writing for a consideration variously quoted from fifty cents to eight dollars, are most brutal and nefarious. They are transgressors against human decency, akin to the medical expert (?) who names every symptom and complaint covering every ailment in the human anatomy, guaranteeing a positive cure at a nominal figure, thus preying, vulture-like, upon the credulity of the afflicted, who are ever ready to sacrifice their last remaining dollar with the hope of immediate relief. The least considered, yet most essential factor to success in motion pictures, is the story. It is the fundamental principle of the art. It is the controlling feature of every successful film. For a tense and gripping dramatic subject, or brilliant, sparkling comedy, will go farther to engage the attention of an audience than all the technical and mechanical skill possible. Indifferent acting, facial imperfections, static spots, lack of sharpness, all are forgotten if the story is of sufficient interest. Yet there is a class of cormorants with nerve sufficient to advertise that they will teach the art of script writing for a trifling monetary consideration, and there exists a following of willing victims, who are ever ready to contribute to the maintenance and support of this unworthy class of fakers. The lure and fascination of motion pictures has drawn a following from a class of persons who, before their introduction, rarely attended a place of entertainment. This class, as a rule, in their ignorance of the eternal fitness of things, are inspired with a belief that the composition and development of a story is a trifling undertaking. Chance throws in their way some magazine or trade publication whose advertising columns set forth in glowing terms that the demand for stories is so great that a chance for an immediate solid income is within their grasp, writing scenarios for motion pictures. They immediately seize the bait, and in many instances sacrifice real necessities, with a hope for fame and handsome pecuniary returns. Script editors have pity for this class of victims. Why, the faculty for the composition of a scenario is a gift. It cannot be taught any more than the gift of writing fiction. Anyone possessed of a brain sufficiently imaginative and original to evolve themes of sufficient interest for motion pictures should, by diligent application, fit themselves to write short stories. The construction or form of a scenario, from the synopsis of a story already written, for practical purposes, is another matter. Yet, even this qualification is a question, for directors, as a rule, are not in consonance as to any set form or method to be followed in producing a film. Some only require the barest outline of the plot, to which they construct the various scenes for its development, while others, again, will jump at a script already prepared for them. The scarcity of suitable themes, sufficiently striking to command attention for motion pictures, is evidenced in the present prevalence of old stories and plays, with which the market at present is flooded. Shakespeare, Sir Walter Scott, Burns, Dickens, Wilkie Collins, Charles Reade—we might go on indefinitely—have all been drawn upon, and now the great stars of the dramatic world, as well as the most prominent managers, who, five years and less since, would have elevated their nostrils and sniffed the air with contempt at the bare mention of motion pictures, are forsaking their former allegiance to the "legit" and sneaking into the pictures of the "movie," where the financial grass is richer and more nourishing. Good scenarios are very scarce, and the faculty of writing them cannot be taught. Teach tinting and toning? Yes. Teach camera operating? Yes. Teach projecting machine operating? Yes. Teach scenario writing? No! Save your money!

Attention! Another Next Week!

We have used Mr. Vinton's statement complete, because it is too frankly instructive to curtail. He has served as director, special writer or editor for Shamrock, American, Comet, etc., and the words of Vinton must be reckoned with. He speaks from long experience as an actor, director, fiction and picture play writer and playwright. He supports the contentions of Editor Hoadley, and next week we take pleasure in announcing a statement from the pen of Giles R. Warren, director of the Victor Film Company and a man universally admired by fellow directors, editors and writers alike. He also pays his respects to the "institutes," and you cannot afford to miss his words of advice. By the way, we hope the "house organs" issued for the purpose of carrying the advertisements of the "universities" are following these articles closely. The "editors" can illy call such men as Plimpton, Hoadley, Vinton, Schulberg and Warren "liars," although Epes Winthrop Sargent, A. W. Thomas and the editor of this department were long ago placed in the "Ananias" class by those who never wrote a successful script in their lives.

And Still Another Change

Changes come thick and fast in the Universal editorial forces, and we advise writers to send no scripts to the Universal at present. The staff-writing plan is being tried out, but they will soon come back to the free-lance contributor, in order to get variety. B. P. Schulberg, whose rejection slips are considered so artistic that the absence of a check is a mere trifle, has been transferred from Rex to the Imp Films Company, where he will continue to turn out the good stuff for which he is noted. His particular clientele of writers should remember Schulberg's change of address. It is the plan of the Universal to transfer all studios to the Pacific Coast and maintain only administrative offices in New York. The plan is being worked out and may be put in effect within a few months.

A Line from Mr. Thomas

Mr. A. W. Thomas, associate editor of Photoplay Magazine, writes, congratulating us on the campaign waged against the "school" system and saying we are right.

Team Work

A New York letter to the department in part is as follows:

> We, my partner and I, couldn't get along without the News and its script department page. Writers should draw you up a testimonial of thanks and appreciation. You have saved many hard-earned dollars for writers about to pull the hook and cork under water on the "school" idea. I am turning out scripts with a fellow writer. Sometimes I furnish the plot germs and often he comes across with a good one. We go over the ideas together and each tries out his angle of its development. Then we merge our work, taking out the best and finally writing the complete script. We take turns in this work, too, to give different methods of production. We are both rather experienced, having turned out scripts by team work for over a year, and are finding ready markets.

We know of several "firms" of script writers. When both are talented and original, and also congenial, the scheme should be productive of increased output and at the same time sustained superiority.

"He Gives Me Ideas"

"He gives me ideas, and that is what counts," writes a Los Angeles scribe, in complimenting Giles R. Warren, of the Victor Company. Yes, Warren has been known to do this very thing. It is sometimes accomplished by unusually keen editors, who know the peculiar capabilities of certain writers, and out of the goodness of their hearts, give these writers ideas which the editors have reason to believe can be handled peculiarly well by the writers in question.

Right Sort of Advice

Epes Winthrop Sargent writes on advice, and he puts the subject so pertinently that we quote, as follows:

> The point is that advice is only good when it is backed by positive knowledge. The mere fact that a person should know what he is talking about doesn't mean that he does, and some of the advice handed out by supposed authorities is positively hurtful. There is only one real test as to the value of your work. If you sell your scripts, you are writing the right sort of stuff. If you are not, look to the screen and see what is being produced. Then look at your scripts and see wherein they are different. Of course, you are likely to think that they are infinitely better than the stuff put out on the screen, but that is not the point. This poor stuff sells, and yours doesn't. See wherein your script is different from the script that sells. Do not write down to the level of the stuff you see, but write along the same broad lines. Don't be too ready to seek or accept advice. Find out first if it is worth anything. If you are worth helping, if your work shows promise, you'll probably get all the help you need from script editors themselves if you kep at it long enough to win their attention, but do not be in too much of a hurry.

The Scale of Prices

Despite the assertion of a writer that he made $2,000, or was it $1,800, two years ago writing picture plays, as a free lance, the prices to the ordinary writer remain about the same, thank you. Twenty-five or thirty dollars remains the average remuneration for the 1,000-foot script, and as much as ten dollars is offered for half-reel stuff, which is much harder to write. Fifty dollars is the latest price offered for two-reel material, which is easier to write than split-reel stuff or even the story of one thousand feet. Higher prices should be paid for split-reel stories. They are in great demand and are scarce, and yet the manufacturers wonder why the supply is limited. It at least thirty dollars was paid for split-reel comedy, the supply of good material would be greater, in our opinion.

Mastering the Technics

Technic without story is nothing. Story and technic are everything. A writer can sell "hot stuff" with or without technic, but he can get more money for the said "hot stuff" if it is laid out in workmanlike way. At least that is the present ruling. Louis Reeves Harrison writes a paragraph that appeals to us. Here it is:

> Should a photodramatist master the technics? Most certainly, on the general principle that a man studies medicine to avoid taking any. He knows what not to do. Absorb information from every possible source, for knowledge is almost the only thing a man gains in process of giving it away, and mental work of almost every kind calls for generous and ungrudging pains. Producers are not yet able to dispassionately weigh the relative value of original and hack work, but what is new and fresh and vigorous will win out in the end.
> No original playwright need cudgel his brains for a theme if he keeps his eyes open to what is going on in the animate world about him, things innumerable of universal interest afford him opportunity if he has the wit to perceive them. The question is not what someone else has done thoroughly in times gone by, but what is worth doing now.

Finding Ideas.

More ideas for original plots will come with the habit of observation. The man trained to observe will never be charged with lack of originality. We believe there is a wealth of material for good human interest stories in any environment, provided one is educated to observe what is transpiring before one's very eyes. It's all very well to write scripts with the action placed in Alaska, California, etc. But before the beginner casts his net far afield for ideas, let him look around a little closer home. Write first of the scenes and the people you are familiar with. If you have never visited Alaska or California or the forests of Maine, but live instead in Indiana or Illinois, perhaps you will do well to cast your plots in Indiana or Illinois. Take Booth Tarkington, for example. The first story he ever wrote was called "The Gentleman from Indiana." The plot was cast in rural Indiana, where Tarkington was born and reared. McClure's grabbed the story, and it made fame and fortune for Tarkington. He crammed that story with local color and tense situation. He described home life before writing of Europe. You try the same plan.

WM. LORD WRIGHT.

The Lubin Film Company this week sends two troups south for the winter. Director Wilbert Melville will locate in Los Angeles, Ca. He takes a big company, selected from the best Lubin players, and two carloads of equipment.

F. J. Grandon and his company go to Birmingham, Ala., where arrangements for a new studio have been perfected, including quarters for the players, rough riders and horses which always figure in Mr. Grandon's pictures. This arrangement will leave five companies still at the Philadelphia plant and four in the South and Southwest.

By ERNST LUZ

Much is said in regards to monotonously playing in the same key and learning certain correct modulations for the purpose of overcoming this. While it is of advantage to all pianists to know the proper or good modulations connecting the different keys, it is more essential to sight-reading than picture playing. In changing your tempos or musical numbers at certain points in the picture where the line of action opens a new incident or story, necessary to the clarity of the entire picture, it is not essential that you play your new number in a relative key or that you modulate into it when it is not in relative key. In fact when making your segues at such certain points it is more effective to go to a foreign key. The fact that there is an interruption has the tendency of exciting new interest. It is only necessary to follow two rules to do this effectively, viz.: In making changes in or from quiet, sentimental or pathetic scenes, give your number a decided diminuendo, opening the new number with some precision, and as much P or F as required by new action. At points where the picture action shows great contrast the music should show the same contrast, and rule 2 will apply, viz.: When segue is made from tumult into pathetic it is effective to crescendo your tumult and make abrupt pause regardless of chord or key, breaking your number abruptly, making a slight relief pause and then open your new number with precision, regardless of key. The same rule applies in going from the tumultuous to descriptive or sentimental, or in creating picture tableaus of such effect. The crescendo is not effective in going from the pathetic, etc., to the tumult number.

This second rule is well illustrated in segue from 6 to 7 in Part I of the Vitagraph feature, "The Mills of the Gods." No. 6 accompanies the advance of cavalry in military style on a mob and closes with partly riotous action and a leader introducing a very pathetic death scene to end of reel. By toning your heavy march to the tumult of the action and breaking it abruptly at first sign of leader (making a very slight pause) your pathetic number will be very much more effective, which is very essential to the picture, for at this point you should create the sympatby of your hearers, giving the interested characters more weight in the succeeding two parts. In this picture the similar effect is called for several times, although not as pronounced as at the above-mentioned, for the picture is intensely dramatic and, with some musical assistance, cannot fail to excite interest. I do not suggest a dramatic number for No. 6, as the same effect can be obtained with the heavy march hurried, and it is essential to the introducing of the action, and it would invite the losing of a necessary effect to make an additional segue in the short footage of combined action.

To those who think it positively necessary to play in relative keys or use connecting modulations, I would suggest that they inform themselves with a view to answering the following questions.

In the very best of vaudeville acts requiring segue musical numbers is the relative key rule observed, and does the non-observance harm the act? In the highest class dramatic productions are the segue numbers made abrupt or are they worked out with a view to harmoniously connect? Is it not true that in many excellent musical compositions new phrases are opened by a possible trumpet call in entirely unconnected key?

The immortal Wagner created most beautiful effects in this manner. Richter, Sechter, Muller and other well-known harmony theorists all agree as to the value of enharmonic effects for making the harmonious more beautiful, and this more forcibly applies to the dramatic in music.

The essential in picture playing is to know how and when to make a segue, and then it will make very little difference as to what keys the numbers you use are written. To learn this is far more simple than acquiring the correct modulations, for while it is possible to memorize all modulations, the usual time allotted by the picture action for making your changes in tempos or numbers is seldom sufficient to properly work out such modulations, making them anything but practical. The use of numbers in relative keys is practical, but requires thought and preparation. It is of little value in making quick segues, wherefore, numbers must be cut into and do not musically beautify the picture enough to make it of essential value in picture playing. When we have the real "Feature Musical Pictureplay," this point will be worked out correctly, for in that case the picture as well as the music will be artistically thought out, allowing for all the musical as well as the camera possibilities.

On another page we herald the coming of Mr. Modest Altschuler, conductor of the "Russian Symphony Orchestra," as an advocate of the "Musical Film." That is going some. (Slang, but good.)

* * * *

No. This is not Vitagraph week. In the course of events it just happened, and it being as it is, it might be well to comment on it. The "Money King's" plot explains itself, the picture contains action only in the third reel, which is of little value musically. The "Mills of the Gods" is interesting, and why the end of the picture is cut into, making it practically impossible musically, is hard to understand Were the dramatic or fire scene and the happy ending worked out separately it would be simple to make a good and satisfying impression. It certainly was not clarity of picture that prompted the joining of the reel in this manner. The contrast between the heavy dramatic number and the bright curtain music for happy ending is an excellent musical effect. Why, then, allow the picture to mar it?

"Rip Van Winkle" gives excellent opportunities for novel effects in storm and spirit scenes.

By giving with their musical suggestion circular four, two-bar dramatic themes which were practical for segue use, the Vitagraph Company could have been assured of having these scenes worked out to advantage, and I am sure the musician would have appreciated it more than all the other combined suggestions. Incidentally I would also make mention that "dramatic chords" do not convey any specific musical meaning. If there is no desire to become acquainted with the different dramatic effects and their correct terms. it is more comprehensively stated by the words, fire, fight, struggle, sneaky, etc. These facts are not cited with a view to criticism, for they are applicable to all makers of film, and advanced for the purpose of creating thought, which I hope will ultimately result in making better picture playing possible.

As advance information I can say that I bave interested Carl Fischer, music publisher, Cooper Square, New York City, to publish music practical and in practical manner for picture playing, which I am sure will simplify the work. The mere fact that the work is approved by Carl Fischer is an assurance that it will be of the best. Those that are informed will tell you tbat his catalogue is the largest and most select of any publisher in the United States. Full description will be given, together with inducements in due time.

MUSICAL PLOTS

By Ernst Luz.

A few rules governing their use.

Tbe cues given will allow for natural ending of strains, unless "Leader" cue, in which case a quick segue should be made unless otberwise stated. Avoid Overtures and Potpourris in their entirety; each picture creates its own selection or potpourri. The cues are so stated as to give you botb a prompt and direct cue. You are safe in making segue as soon as you are positive of your prompt cue. Avoid introductions to numbers unless otherwise stated. Avoid the shading of numbers as printed, an even mezzo forte being the best. From this you can get both pp and ff shadings with effect according to tbe demands of picture action. When shading is positively essential you will find words "Tone to action." Avoid the use of books. They are not practical for setting-up. In playing numbers following a certain line of action drop to pp in case there is a cut-in of flash scenes. For playing recopy plots legibly on large paper and fasten by clasp to rigbt of music stand or piano. Read the Film Stories in this magazine as it will familiarize you with tbe cues. Studio projection would allow for material improvement in set-ups. We are always ready to hear from you and explain any difficulties you may have with these plots or otherwise. If personal reply is requested enclose stamped envelope.

MR. MODEST ALTSCHULER

By Ernst Luz

It certainly affords me great pleasure in introducing to you Mr. Modest Altschuler, conductor of the Russian Symphony Orchestra, as an enthusiast of the "musical film," and who is at the present time setting music of his own composition to the Hochstetter productions, "Life of John Bunyan" and "Pilgrim's Progress."

Mr. Altschuler was horn in Moscow, Russia, February 18, 1873, acquiring his musical proficiency in Europe. For the last fifteen years his endeavors have heen confined solely to America, ten years of which he has heen conducting the Russian Symphony Orchestra, which organization is known from the Atlantic to the Pacific Coast. He composed the music for the Shakespearean dramas as played hy the Ben Greet Players, under the personal direction of Ben Greet; also for the production of Maeterlinck's "Mary Magdalen." as produced at the New Theatre.

It was a pleasant as well as interesting interview that I had, and I found Mr. Altschuler not only Modest hy name but equally so in manner, which never altered even when expressing his highest ideals regarding the "musical film." Mr. Altschuler's opinion of the musical picture is hest expressed in his own words, viz.: "The noise which is unavoidable in staged musical productions will disturb that which is hetter in music, and I can see no hetter way of creating the higher ideals of thought with a more telling effect on the human impulses than in the combination of music and the picture." This is no longer theory with Mr. Altschuler, for he is putting his entire energy into the work, which, with his musical ahility, is an assurance that the "musical film" will make great forward strides.

The picture can surely he flattered in having so talented and well-known a musical composer as an advocate, whose energies will surely lead to the musical betterment of the picture, and it would be well for the trade at large to not overlook the results, for I feel doubly sure at this time that the picture will musically retrieve itself hy doing somehing "hig," as suggested in the News some months ago.

That the Russian Symphony Orchestra will render a musical portrayal to a film under the ahle conductor, "Mr. Modest Altschuler," is already an assured fact, and this must assure us as to the musical future of the picture.

During my interview I also learned that another well-known conductor and composer had written a personal letter to Mr. Altschuler, tbe tone of which would imply that the writer desired to make claim that he originated the thought. Some more assurance. I would welcome them all, and wish them in this great and glorious new field "Prosperity."

Power's Cameragraph

The Machine That DEFIES TIME

Strictly speaking, that is not true; for Father Time—"The tomb builder"—finally gets us all. But, we do say this: That every individual part of POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH is composed of the hest material that modern scientific knowledge, experience and money afford; that each part must pass the most rigid test for accuracy and strength.

The result is a machine upon whicb wear and tear have the least possihle effect, and which, with reasonable treatment, will last for years.

Read what George Montgomery, Operator, Yorkville Theatre, East 86th Street, New York, has to say on this subject:

"I am running a Power's No. 6. It was installed here in Novemher, 1910, and it has run every day since and has never cost a cent for repairs. Neitber has it ever got hound or broke down in any way. Is this not a record for any make of M. P. machine?"

It projects a splendid, clear, steady picture, and runs like a clock.

The ahove concerns our No. 6. Since then our latest model, No. 6-A, has been put on the market. In it are to he found many improvements wbich more recent knowledge affords. Catalogue D gives full details.

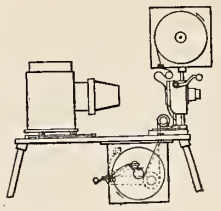
INNOVATIVE

Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Especially for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City

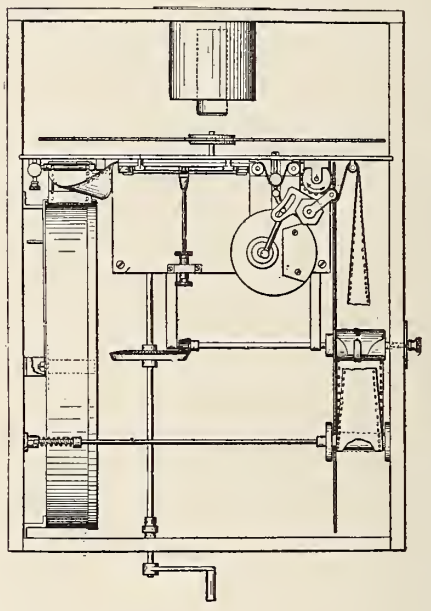
The Supreme Court of the United States has rendered an epochal decision in the celebrated Bath Tub Trust case, Justice McKenna delivering the unanimous opinion of that august body. It establishes the broad principle that there can be no monopoly in an unpatented product of, or an accessory to, a patented machine or device without violation of the Sherman anti-trust law. The Bath Tub Trust, usually so called, was not charged with being a trust, but with conspiracy to monopolize trade. It was not properly a question of patents at all, but merely as to the method of marketing and controlling the trade. It is the prostitution of the patent law which is condemned, not its legitimate operation. By this decision "license agreements" conditional on the maintenance of a prescribed price-list, prohibitive of trade with independents, and similar restrictions, are illegal. This is a ruling of vital importance, particularly to the motion picture art and trade, since it seems to settle emphatically the questions of film dictation, the extortion of tribute from exhibitors, etc. The emancipation thus effected must inevitably result in the advancement of the art and be of benefit to the public generally. The monopoly which is condemned is not the monopoly created by operation of law, but the monopoly created by unlawful conspiracy, which is a wrong against the public. As compared with the Supreme Court's decision in the "mimeograph case," rendered last year, the distinction seems to be that the right conferred upon a patent holder, while very broad, does not extend beyond the article patented. Monopolistic practices with regard to it, even though seemingly unjust and unreasonable, are sustained. Monopolistic practices with regard to things made with it are without warrant, and unlawful.

To quote from the syllabus: "Rights conferred by patents are indeed very definite and extensive, but they do not give, any more than other rights, an universal license against positive prohibition. The Sherman law is a limitation of rights, rights which may be pushed to evil consequences, and therefore restrained."

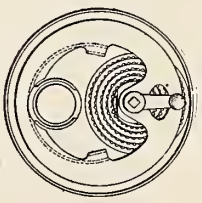
PRIMITIVE one-scene stage of the Elizabethan period, with its grotesque limitations and subterfuges, contrasted with the ultra-realistic, multi-scenic stage of the present day, with its wealth of accessories, indicates wonderful evolution, and the end is not yet. Ordinarily it is not possible to present more than six or eight changes of scene in a play, usually only three or four, thus limiting the action to a few localities and interfering with the continuity of the story, particularly in the dramatization of novels. An innovation which virtually extends the scenery and action beyond the limits of the stage is the employment of motion pictures as sequential interact connectives illustrative of the narrative, the film blending at either end with the set scenes between which it is interposed. Obviously, this expedient admits of the visual portrayal of incidents and scenes that it would be otherwise practically impossible to incorporate in the play, and suggests a new field for exploitation and development. This innovation has been successfully experimented with in musical comedy, the whole production being so carefully fitted together as to create a sensation.



Letters Patent No. 1,042,430, issued to Horace W. Griggs, of Milwaukee, Wis., is for certain improvements for winding moving picture films, the object being to wind the films at a uniform tension from beginning to end of wind, regardless of the speed of the driving mechanism or the increase in diameter of the roll, the illustration showing the device as applied to a kinematograph. It embodies a film-winding device, a reel shaft, a disk attached thereto, movable friction gears on each side of said disk, supported by arms pivoted on a power shaft, a lever attached to the power shaft by a divided contact arm and carrying rollers for engagement with the film winding upon said reel, clamping means for adjusting said lever relatively to the friction gears, radial guide bars for the gear arms, and an adjusting screw and spring for regulating the pressure of the gears against the disk.



Patent No. 1,044,028, issued to George W. Curtiss, of Kansas City, Mo., relates to chronophotographic cameras for taking pictures upon "moving picture films," and is of the intermittent feed type. The objects of the invention are to provide mechanism that is compact and of small dimensions; to eliminate vibration; to provide a very simple and reliable film-tension device; to provide means whereby the camera is convertible into a projecting kinetoscope by simply inserting a lamp and condenser, and to eliminate springs as much as possible in connection with the idle film rollers. The illustration is a plan of mechanism embodying the invention, showing the film threaded therein from a magazine box into the take-up reel, the top or cover of the lightproof case being omitted. The claims embody intermittent web feeding mechanism, comprising a web-shifting roller mounted on a vertical axis, a reciprocatory support for said axis, guides for said support, a member secured to said axis above the roller, a stationary guide-pin passing slidably through an opening in said member, parallel to the line of motion of said roller, and other specific features of construction.



The object of Letters Patent No. 1,043,496, issued to Horace Wyman, of Worcester, Mass., is the provision of a photographic film-developing device of simple construction and operation, consisting of a segment of a cylinder, having a circular flange or plate at each end, attached thereto. There is an open space next to the flanges, that is intermediate the flanges and the ends of the segment of the cylinder. Within the segment of the cylinder, and secured thereto, is a tubular hollow receptacle, to loosely receive and hold the film to be developed. Arranged opposite the segment of the cylinder, and having its axis parallel to that of the said segment, is a reel carried on a spindle, which has bearings in the flanges or plates above referred to. A flexible apron, having its edges or borders raised above its surface, and one end attached to the reel, is wound or wrapped in layers around the outside of both the segment of the cylinder and the reel. The raised borders or edges pass into the spaces between the flanges and the ends of the segment of the cylinder, whereby the surfaces of the segment and the apron may contact, and the borders are guided by the end flanges or plates. A tank containing a developing solution is used to receive the developing device. A crank handle on the spindle carrying the reel is used to rotate the reel. By turning the crank handle, the reel is rotated and the apron is drawn around the segment of the cylinder and wound, together with the film, in layers on the reel in the solution.

Judge Powell, in his syllabus to the case of Burden vs. State (8 Ga. App., 118), says: "Persons who go to churches must not carry liquor either on their insides or on their outsides." Why Burden the State of Georgia with such an admonition? Perhaps, however, its proximity to North Carolina and South Carolina has a demoralizing effect. But Georgia should not heed what the Carolina governors say to each other.

N organization known as the British Empire Trade-Mark Association has been formed, largely as an outgrowth of the British Empire League, for the purpose of adopting and registering a trade-mark to denote goods manufactured in the British Empire. Briefly, the objects are: (1) to provide a simple, practical and definite means of indentification of British goods which will show clearly the particular part of the empire in which such goods are produced; (2) to provide a mark which, being placed beside a private trade-mark, would render it more difficult and dangerous for the fraudulent imitation of such a mark in foreign countries; (3) to encourage and stimulate the demand for British goods.

Patent No. 1,044,258, issued to Edward J. Schafer, of Seaside, Ore., is for a film-mending machine adapted to be attached to any rewinding machine and capable of manipulation with one hand if desired, while the operator's other hand is employed in turning the projecting machine. When, in winding or rewinding the films on the reels, or when running films through the projectors, etc., the film becomes torn or broken, the rejoining of the several ends involves the scraping of the film, the trimming down of the torn edges and the registration of the perforations, operations heretofore long and tedious and requiring the whole attention of the operator. The accompanying perspective view shows the essential features of the invention, which includes a transparent plate or table, on which the film is laid in operating on the same, and beneath which a source of illumination is located, with a transparent sheet of mica between the source of illumination and the glass table top, to prevent heating and subsequent injury to the film; clamps having dowels or pins to enter the perforations and hold the film sections in position; tension devices for holding the adjacent ends of the films on the table; a presser for holding the repaired parts down on the table until they have become firmly united; a gage for effecting the proper "match" of the two film sections; a cutting mechanism for trimming the torn ends of the film; means for insuring the proper relative position of the "line of severance," and a scraper for removing the emulsion from the film body or base preparatory to making the repairs.

Crooked Lake, New York State, having been chosen by the lawyers composing the Northern Berkshire Bar Association of Massachusetts as a place for their annual outing is no reason why the lay press should indulge in such malicious hilarity at their expense. He would be a very indifferent lawyer indeed who could not navigate, a la Tom Hood,

"Straight down the crooked lane,
And all around the square."

We shall be pleased to answer pertinent questions propounded by readers of the Moving Picture News.

THE MISSION OF THE CAROLS (Dec. 10).—The privations of poverty has soured the milk of human kindness in the breast of the mother of little Gene and Marie. As she sends them out for their evening's occupation of singing in the cafes the racy songs of the boulevards, thereby earning their meagre fare, her manner is unkind and unmotherly. The song-bird fledglings are liked by the Countess de Grace, who hears them sing, and she invites them to come to her house on the eve of the Christ Day. The children go there and hear the Countess's children sing the olden yuletide carols. The simple beauty of the music touches the heart of the sophisticated urchins, in whose street life had never heard such melody, so nobly exquisite. They feel their songs to be profane compared to the loveliness of the carols, and tell the Countess that they cannot here sing their rude ditties. The spirit of the urchins is admired, and the Countess and her friends teach Gene and Marie the carols which, they being good musicians, are quickly learned. Generously the Countess rewards them, and, laden with gifts, back to their hovel trudge the tiny troubadours. Their mother is dozing upon her pallet, and the children arrange the gifts of money and creature comforts around the room, singing the carols they had just learned. Upon the waking ears of the mother comes the sweet natal song of her long gone childhood and the ice around the mother's heart, formed through the winter of her life of drudgery, melts, the sunshine of the melodies dispersing the frowns and mellowing the scolding voice, bringing sweetness again to the mother's soul and happiness reflexly to the little forlorn ones. The picture closes with the mother kissing her children affectionately as she goes forth on her hard day's work.

Completed was the mission of the carols.

TRAVELS ON THE URAL MOUNTAINS.—Scenic high life, three thousand and more feet above the sea. Over mighty glaciers, passing drifts of snow of fabulous depth. The snowbound forest in garments of ice.

AN ELEPHANT SLEUTH (Dec. 12).—Ignatz and his very sweet sweetheart meet clandestinely. Ignatz loves his sweetheart "like anything," even more so. He writes to her a tender missive in which he confides that the time is ripe (also cherries) for her to leave her cahbage-head of an uncle, to join one who loves her more than he loves prunes. He drops this letter through the gate, but unfortunately the cabbage-head of an uncle is reclining there in an easy cair rustling the foliage with his euphonious snores. The uncle, of course, is annoyed at being identified as a cabbage-head and he locks Ignatz's sweetheart, the fair Faprika Bacteria, in a closet. Of course the warm Paprika does not show up at the trysting place and Ignatz experiences more grief than at any time since his pet poodle had mumps. In desperation he advertises, stating that he will give a reward in money or a full set of second-hand false teeth to anyone who will bring back his Bonny to him. He receives an answer from a man saying that his trained elephant can recover anything from upholstery to lost appetites, and that he has a trunk full of credentials. It is signed Esau. Esau, however, neglects to say whether he eats them alive. Esau brings his pachyderm to call upon Ignatz Mouse and the tiny animal scents a Yale lock of the girl's hair. Having received the clue, he saunters forth, an elephant on his own hands or his own feet, in quest of the imprisoned maiden, who is closeted with herself and a decidedly lachrymose tendency. The elephant, regardless of the high cost of Dresden china and real estate, goes a devastating way and extricates the lady from the closet. He bends the knee while the captive climbs upon his back, when off they trot to lovelorn Ignatz. Ignatz is so delighted that he adopts the elephant into his family and all live happily ever after.

THE HEART OF A SOLDIER (Dec. 14).—In the twilight of his life, John Menton, an old veteran, finds himself alone and destitute. In desperation he turns to the statue of his old commander, General Grant, then to that of President Lincoln, hoping in vain that one or the other might offer an inspiration, but in both cases the marble statues look upon his misery in mute silence.

Disconsolate, he wanders down the avenue in quest of aid. At the Revere mansion he pitifully begs for alms from the wealthy owners, who are about to enter their automobile. His plea is to be refused by this man of means, when Bob Lucas, the young suitor of Ruth Revere, moved by the old man's evident want, offers him substantial alms, which incurs for Lucas the animosity of Mrs. Revere.

On the return of the parents, young Lucas makes a strong appeal for the hand of the daughter, but his suit is refused and he dejectedly leaves the house.

In due course, a locket of the madam is missing and she recalls having placed it on the library table at the time of her talk with Bob Lucas. All search proves unavailing and she summons Lucas by telephone and, on his arrival, brazenly accuses him of having stolen the locket. His earnest and strong assurance of any knowledge concerning the loss is totally disregarded, because, with feminine characteristic, the madam has determined he must have stolen it.

Sorrowful and dejected, he wanders away to grieve over the multitude of catastrophes that have befallen him.

In the meantime, the missing locket, which accidentally fell into the waste basket, passes along the route to the city dumps. Through force of circumstances the old veteran has hied himself to that quarter, as was his custom when in dire distress, to seek in the refuse of the city something that might be of value. Lo! and behold! this trip is not unrewarded. Debating with himself the course to pursue, he finds a seat in the park where the fates have guided the steps of the heartsick lover. Recognition is mutual, but what service can the old soldier render our friend? The newly-found token of wealth is uppermost in the soldier's heart and he tells his former benefactor of his lucky find. Young Lucas looks, then stares at the locket; he can scarcely believe his eyes. Is he awake or are the fates taunting him? He tells the old soldier of the cloud resting over him, and together the two hurry to the Reveres, where joy over the recovery knows no bounds.

Old Revere liberally rewards the needy old veteran and young Lucas could almost mortgage his future prospects to pay the good fortune this vindication means to him. The heart of Mrs. Revere is softened, the barriers are broken down and Bob Lucas is to have the hand of Ruth for his keeping for life.

The old veteran slowly repairs to the statue of President Lincoln, his heart too full for utterance. The shock of this unexpected joy is too great and at the hase of the statue his frail stature falters and his soul passes on to join the army in the great beyond.

PATHE'S WEEKLY No. 50 (Dec. 9).

A MARKED MAN (Dec. 10).—An escaped maniac and infanticide, who is being sought by the police of a small town, wanders, in search of food, into a shoemaker's shop in which is the cobbler's little daughter—alone. The child offers him some food and the maniac struggles with himself to overcome his desire to kill the little one, serenely unconscious of his upraised knife.

FATE'S DECREE (Dec. 11).—The necessity for illness is explained by the case of the Martinez family. Senora Martinez, although guiltless, is found by her husband in a compromising situation. With bitter denunciation he orders her from his home, and even the pleading of their little daughter does not soften his heart. When it is finally proven to him that his wife is entirely innocent Martinez is unable to find her to ask to be forgiven. Next his little daughter becomes ill from a peculiar complaint. The physician orders that a nurse be engaged and Martinez advertises. Senora Martinez, seeking employment, reads the "ad" and violates her decision never to return to her old home again. Reaching the house she rushes unannounced to the bedside. The heartbroken child is overjoyed and is resting happily in her mother's arms when Martinez enters the room and begs forgiveness. The happy family is united and the physician gives it as his opinion that the child's illness was fate's decree.

THE COMPACT (Dec. 12).—John Blair, the district attorney of a large city, is a drug fiend, and on the day he is to sum up the people's case in a celebrated murder trial he finds that he is unable to continue. A young lawyer named Gary, who has followed the case, calls upon Blair, seeking employment. The following scene is achieved by a double exposure which is perfectly accomplished. Confronting each other the similarity of their countenances astounds them both and it gives Blair an idea. He offers Gary $1,000 to exchange positions with him. Gary agrees and they exchange apparel. Blair goes to the poor lodgings of Gary, while Gary, accompanied by Blair's wife, who has not detected the substitution, goes to court. With an eloquent summing up Gary wins the case. It is then he breaks the news to Mrs. Blair. She is at first unconvinced, but finally they both go to Gary's boarding place where they find the real Blair—dead. His good name and the reputation of his family are at stake, so a compact is arranged whereby Gary becomes Blair and the real Blair is buried as Gary, the unknown.

THE CAPTURE OF MR. SOFTLY BEATIT (Dec. 13).—Mr. Beatit has a mania for appropriating any sort of vehicle. His first adventure is with a bicycle, on which he is discovered by the police, who reach for him, but as they do so he mysteriously disappears. Next he finds an automobile in which he unceremoniously breaks in upon dinner parties and other family gatherings. A trick film and a very good one.

THE RISE AND FALL OF MICKEY MAhone (Dec. 14).—Mickey Mahone was the laziest man in town and, try as she might, his good wife could never stir him to moving lively. Mickey gets away with a large portion of the family's rather meagre income and is pursued by his wife and daughter and a few neighbors. The trail is lost at the railroad station and the pursuers return home, with the exception of Mickey's daughter, who lingers behind long enough to observe Mickey about to emerge from a baker's barrel. She locks the lid on the barrel with Mickey inside. A truckman claims the barrel among other freight and swings it on the tail-board of his truck. At the top of a hill the barrel rolls off and continues merrily on its way until it drops with a thud in the Mahone's back yard. But you can't keep a good man down, and Mickey admits that he is a good man, although a little sore after his journey.

THE CROOKED PATH—A STORY OF THE UNDERWORLD (Two Reel) (Dec. 13).—Dan Lyons, a crook, has just stolen a watch and some money from a banker and is being chased by a crowd and police, but runs up an alley and gives them the slip. He goes to the home of his sweetheart, Nell Harris, and shows her the swag. He asks her to go to a dance-hall and, while they are there, the hall is raided and Lyons is caught, taken to jail, and given a long term in prison. Nell is very unhappy and takes a walk in the park, where she reads in the paper the account of Lyons' trial. While she is sitting on a bench crying a clergyman, Will Kimball, sees her and asks what he can do. She tells him she wants to be a good girl. He tells her he will lead her to the straight road. He talks to her and decides to take her home to his mother, who is blind. They go to his home and Nell is to act as companion to Mrs. Kimball. Will Kimball falls in love with Nell and asks her to marry him. They become engaged. Lyons, one day, sees a rat come in his cell; he writes a note on a piece of his shirt in blood, ties the note to the rat's tail and sends it out through the drain pipe again. Dan's pal, who has been hanging around the prison wall ever since Dan was captured, sees the rat, catches it, finds the note and sends in a string tied to the rat's tail and then some saws, which Dan pulls into his cell through the drain. Dan saws through the bars of his cell and escapes. He is seen by the guards and followed. He swims a river, goes through woods and underbrush and comes to an old ruin, where he throws the guards off the trail. He comes to a scarecrow, takes the clothes off and changes from his convict suit, then meets his pal at an old tree. They jump a freight train and get back to the city. Nell reads of Dan's escape and it makes her very unhappy. Dan is standing in the street and is nearly run down by Kimball's auto. As the car drives off Dan sees Nell in the car. Dan hires another auto and follows them to Kimball's home. He sends a note to Nell; she tells him she will see him. He wants her to go back to the old life with him again; she refuses. Kimball comes into the room and Nell introduces Dan as her brother. The next night Dan and his pal come to rob the Kimballs' home; they get in. Nell hears them and goes down to offer them money. Dan will not accept. While they are talking Kimball comes down with a revolver and covers Dan. Will accuses Nell of helping the thief to enter. The police enter with Dan's pal. They are both handcuffed and taken back to jail. Nell confesses that Dan loved her in the old days. Kimball forgives her and takes her to his arms.

MADELEINE'S CHRISTMAS (Dec. 17).—Hermann Von Schultz plays the first violin at the Pikes Opera House, Cincinnati. Among the ballet or extra girls there is a young French girl, Marguerite Ne Moyer. She is very beautiful, but not over proficient in the language. Her salary is small, but she dresses with excellent taste and is a favorite with the company. Her father has been dead two years and her mother is employed as a forewoman in a department store. Marguerite has a fair voice and the violinist takes great pleasure in instructing her when opportunity permits. Hermann is some twenty years older than the girl, but the little music lessons bring about an attachment and the violinist finds himself deeply in love with his pupil. One night on leaving the store Marguerite's mother is knocked down by a wagon and receives injuries from which, in a few days, she dies. Hermann does all in his power to comfort the girl and help her along, but her condition is far from prosperous. At last Hermann summons up courage and proposes marriage. He can then assure her of more protection. Marguerite accepts him rather joyfully. The wedding is a modest home affair, and as most of the guests are theatrical friends, everybody had a good time, but on breaking up many of the frivolous girls poked fun at the violinist and suggested that he was rather too old to have secured so young and beautiful a girl. A year passes. Marguerite is fairly happy and Hermann passionately in love; then comes a baby girl and a new joy enters the home. The wife is frequently visited by her female theatrical chums, who are very nice, but continually reminding her that she has tied herself up with a man of small quality and much too old. They describe pictures of what her life might be if she were fancy free and could be earning big money upon the stage. The poison weeds are sown and one day Marguerite leaves her home, husband and child and goes to New York to join a local company at an excellent salary. Five years pass and Hermann, broken-hearted, has moved to Milwaukee and working. His only comfort is the child, little Madeleine, who has grown to be a beauty. He goes to the theatre every performance to play, and locks the child in, placing the key in a flower pot outside of the window so that she can get it in case of emergency. It is Christmas eve and a snow blizzard is raging, but Hermann must go to work. Madeleine urges him to play a favorite tune on the fiddle before he leaves her. The song is one that the mother used to sing and the violinist looks up at the lithograph picture of his wife, which hangs over the fireplace. She has been gone just four years, and the tears roll down his cheeks. Madeleine wants to know if Santa Claus will come to-night, and the father tells her yes, he will come, but she must not look for him, as he does not wish to be seen. He puts the child to bed and, leaving the house, puts the key in the flower pot. Presently a knock is heard at the door. Madeleine, who is in bed in the next room, thinks that it is Santa Claus, and calls out that the key is in the flower pot. A woman appears at the window. She gets the key and lets herself in. It is the mother, bedraggled and starving. The child cannot resist the temptation to peek in and see Santa Claus. She sees the woman and tells her she has no right to come into the house. The mother pleads for protection, as the storm will kill her if she is driven out. Madeleine tells her that her father will not allow any woman in the house, but after much persuasion tells the woman she may go upstairs and sleep in the attic. The mother embraces the child, who again goes to bed. The storm is so bad that the theatre cannot open and Hermann returns. Madeleine has again replaced the key in the flower pot and the violinist comes in and sits down in front of the fire. Madeleine creeps in and again persuades him to play the favorite tune. The mother, upstairs, hears the violin and commences to sing the refrain. Hermann hears it and demands of the child who is upstairs. The child replies that it is a woman. Hermann recognizes the voice; he rushes in and drags his long-lost wife out, covering her with kisses. She has returned, as he knew she would. The mother embraces the child frantically, then puts her to bed again. The scene closes as Hermann tells Marguerite to go and get one of the child's stockings. They nail it on the mantelpiece and Hermann goes to a bureau drawer and gets a lot of toys that he has laid in. The two fill the stocking, then sit down by the fire as Hermann loads up his pipe and takes his recreant wife to his arms.

ANNIE CRAWLS UPSTAIRS (Dec. 10).—Annie, the daughter of the janitor, who wears a brace and is three years old, is neglected by her parents. They quarrel. She finds the door ajar and crawls out and up the stairs.

A young girl on the first floor is tempted to go out for a wild night; her mother has been unable to dissuade her. As she opens the door to go, Annie crawls in. In a few minutes the girl goes back to the mirror and takes off her finery. Annie, neglected again, crawls out and upstairs again.

On the second floor an ex-convict is contemplating a hurglary. He is making ready when Annie knocks at the door. When she comes in the man takes her up and kisses her. He puts away his hurglar's kit and Annie crawls out and up again.

On the third floor there is trouble between a pair of lovers. The girl does not want to marry, she wants a career, so the young man says good-bye, but as he opened the door, Annie crawls up. He picks her up and shows the lame leg to the girl. The girl hugs Annie and Annie hugs them both together. Naturally the young man puts her down and turns his whole attention to the young lady. Annie crawls out.

On the fourth floor a seamstress is sewing at the machine, and her little girl, a child of about Annie's age, is trying to attract her attention. The woman gives the child a slap and the child cries. Annie crawls in and the two begin to play together. The woman notices this, picks up her own child, hugs her, and feels her little limbs which, unlike Annie's, are sound and whole, and so neglected, Annie has to go out and climb on.

By now she is so tired that she can hardly crawl up the remaining stairs. On the top floor a young man, a stranger in the city, is contemplating suicide. He is alone, without friends and in despair. Annie comes sleepily in. He picks her up and she falls asleep in his arms. Very gently he carries her downstairs again. The janitor and his wife are still quarreling, but when the young man appears with Annie fast asleep, they are silent, look at the sleeping child and draw each other close.

The young man nods his head and kisses the sleeping child.

A SUNDAY AFTERNOON IN RURAL ENGLAND (Dec. 11).—Many people realize that they only become acquainted with their own country or place of abode when strangers come who must be shown the sights. This scenic film was all taken within a short distance of London, but it is doubtful if many who live in the metropolis have ever seen many of the places which it shows. It carries us into the beautiful rural district of England, through quaint little villages and past wayside inns and speaks of Shakespeare and Dickens.

Along the river and past some of the flower-decked locks whose blossoms rival California's garden spots. Then there are delightful little, old, flat cottages with rose vines clambering all over them and half hiding the diamond-paned windows.

It is a peaceful, restful and exquisitely beautiful picture which is likely to prove all too short to those who love England and to those who love the picturesque wherever it is found.

On the same reel:

NO PLACE FOR A MINISTER'S SON.—In a letter from college Cyrus Brent tells of a play to be presented by the fraternity. His parents, a country minister and a plain, old-fashioned wife, determine to pay him a visit and be present at the rendition of the play. They arrive at the college town the evening before the play is to be presented and manage to locate their son's boarding-house, only to find that he and his chums are attending a dress rehearsal of the play. The landlady, however, ushers them into Cyrus's room, where they decide to await his return. As soon as they are alone they begin to scrutinize and plainly show their disapproval of the photos of actresses and playing-cards which they find upon the table.

In the meantime we get a glimpse of Cyrus and his college chums struggling with their final dress rehearsal at the local town hall, also the stage carpenters, who are very busy building the scenery. Their hammering finally becomes unbearable and the stage director calls off the rehearsal for one hour, in the hope that by that time they will have finished their hammering.

Cyrus and his chums avail themselves of this opportunity to finish the game of cards at his room in the boarding-house, where the old folks unknown to him, are patiently awaiting his return.

At the sound of the boys' footsteps on the stairway the old folks conceal themselves in an adjoining room in order to surprise their son. They see Cyrus and his chums enter and throw off their overcoats, disclosing their stage costumes. One young man represents a gay young thing in a harem skirt, and another, a ballet dancer with a short gauze skirt. They resume their game of cards, the old people watching them from their hiding place. When, however, they see the "ladies" smoking cigarettes, they are filled with indignation at their son's downfall and hurst into the room upbraiding him and his brazen associates. Explanations follow and wigs are removed to the satisfaction of the old people, who decide that college life is too deep for them.

THANHOUSER

BRAINS VERSUS BRAWN (Dec. 15).—Among the suitors of a wealthy widow was a middle-aged scientist, and while the woman was glad to regard him as a friend, she did not see how she could ever accept him as a husband. He was so absent-minded, so impractical that no one could ever rely upon him.

The widow was a great lover of athletics, and one day dragged the professor to witness a meet. He had a perfectly dreary time, and his cup of misery flowed over as they were about to return. An effort was made to rob the widow, and only because of the bravery of one of the young athletes was the crook captured and the pocketbook recovered.

In a few days it dawned upon the professor that while he might be a big potato in the field of science, he was only a small lemon in the garden of love. Drearily brooding over this one evening may explain why he dreamed that he was transported to the time of the Cæsars, and called upon, as an unhappy slave, to fight in the arena. Brute strength could not save him for he didn't have it, hut he called the resources of science to his aid. He astonished Cæsar by offering to fight a gang of gladiators single-handed, the only proviso being that he should select his own weapons. The boon being granted, the scientist constructed a number of neat little dynamite bombs, and literally wiped up the arena with his opponents, much to the amazement and satisfaction of Cæsar.

When the scientist awoke he regarded his dream as a warning that only by scientific management could he hope to win the lady of his heart. Soon the chance came for him to distinguish himself, and he availed himself of it. The rich widow received a letter signed "Black Hand," calling upon her to pay over $10,000. The young athlete swore he would defend her and personally capture the criminals. The scientist promised to rectify matters, but did not go into details. He laid a little scientific trap, and astonished the widow by nabbing the criminal and several policemen while some distance from the scene of action himself. The athlete was confounded, for he was the criminal, and he passed out of the widow's life and entered the service of the State. The widow decided to marry the scientist, for she told one of her dearest friends: "Some people may think the professor is behind the times, but he certainly is a live wire when an emergency arises."

THE OTHER HALF (Dec. 17).—According to men who have devoted years of study to the subject, there are three causes for abject poverty, one is sickness, another inahility to obtain employment, and the third drink. Sometimes, and, in fact, very often, these three cases are combined. There are two ways used to remedy these conditions, one indiscriminate almsgiving, and the other organized charity. It is claimed, and with much reason, that the latter is the only effective cure.

A laborer, who lived with his family in a New York tenement, was in better financial condition than most of his associates. He had some money saved up, while most of his fellow workers literally lived from hand to mouth.

Misfortune came upon the man, however, and as the result of an accident his arm was amputated. When he recovered and applied for his old position he was turned down because he was physically unable to perform the work. Desperate and hopeless he soon degenerated into a common drunken tramp, while his family were on the verge of actual starvation and his wife was very ill.

Indiscriminate charity aided this man, but the coins that were tossed to him went for drink, and his family did not benefit. Then he came under the attention of organized charity and matters soon assumed a better aspect.

Investigation was made, which developed that he was weak rather than worthless, and with proper encouragement might be expected to really reform. His sick wife and several of the children were taken to a country home run by organized charity, where they speedily regained their health and strength. The man secured work he could perform, the wife and eldest daughter were taught how to keep their home in order, and in a short time the family was again on its feet.

Helping the other half to help themselves is work that has brought happiness to many persons who seemed headed for the prison or the almshouse.

WHEN AN OLD MAID GETS BUSY (Dec. 17).—Abigail is an old maid and a confirmed man hater. She carries her hatred to the extent of turning the faces of all the portraits of her male relatives to the wall.

She is informed that she has fallen heir to an immense fortune. In her joy, she invites her old-maid man-hating friends to share her home with her. They come, each one bringing her pet—a cat, a dog, a parrot—and some even mice. These pets become intolerable and her life is made miserable.

In her despair, she resolves to marry so as to get rid of the annoyance. She visits beauty parlors, arrays herself in gorgeous attire and has small photos of herself taken—six for 25 cents. At her first party, she gets busy by putting a photo inside the watch of a married man and one, also, in the watch of an engaged man. The discovery of these photos are productive of trouble to the respective victims. Abigail is found out, and confesses that being an heiress she was desirous of getting married.

After the ladies concerned have given her a piece of their minds, she is left alone. Her maid brings her the cat she has discarded and she hugs it affectionately. And, once more, the portraits of her male relatives are turned to the wall.

SEA ANEMONES (Life at the Bottom of the Sea) (Dec. 22).—In certain seas, the corals, madrepores or authozoaires form immense multi-colored forests. In the numberless species of zoophytes some are very curious to observe. For instance, the Asteria, or star-fish, which moves very slowly. The Acinia, commonly called the Sea Anemone, on account of its brilliant colors and its resemblance to that flower. In fact, the Sea Anemone, like the living coral, draws to itself, with its thousand tentacles, and by learned evolutions, the prey it is seeking, then closes up as soon as the victim is within its grasp.

Which is it—animated vegetation or animals which vegetate? On the same reel:

AN UNFORESEEN EVENT.—Fickle and faithless—like all noblemen of his time—our Marquis even tries to make love to his pretty laundress, Margot. He dreams of making himself handsome to please her, and for that reason alone goes to the barber every day.

Now pretty Margot has a lover who cannot endure the presence of a rival, even though he be rich and nohle.

The Marquis, one day, entrusts his valet, Lucre, to take to Margot a bouquet in which the following note is concealed: "My dear Margot: I will expect you this evening in the grove by the park." Unfortunately, Lucre meets the Marchioness on his way. She takes the flowers from him and, of course, finds the note.

She then orders the valet to carry the bouquet to the girl, requesting him to keep her knowledge of the little tryst from his master. Lucre, therefore, says nothing, and when night came and our nobleman went to meet the pretty Margot, he was quite surprised to find—his own wife!

IMP

THE WORLD WEARY MAN (Dec. 9).—He is a millionaire, young and a bachelor, with all the treasures of the earth, but is unhappy. He is tired of it all. Like Hamlet, man delights him not or women either.

One cold night after a brilliant reception at his home he decides a walk about the city might refresh him. To the surprise of his servant he refused the automobile, and buttoning his coat about him he set forth. After a long stroll he found himself near the water front and a child crying. He sought and found her in the shadow of an old boathouse. He questioned her and found she had been sent out to sell papers, and as the rough street boys had driven her away, her day had been a failure and no papers had been sold. He sought for his bank roll, but remembered he had given all except a little change to a needy beggar. He brought her to her wretched room and left her. At last he found something that held interest for him.

The next day he told his servants he was going away to another country and speedily made his way to the little waif's house, where he engaged a room and made friends with her father, a wretched derelict, broken in health and ambition.

The world weary man has found the world is still attractive, for with the child as his companion, he becomes interested in the amusements of the poor and often brought her to moving picture shows. One day the wretched father suddenly died. This was the turning point in the lives of the waif and the millionaire. He sent for his automobile and, going to her wretched room, where he found her asleep, he put her rag-doll in her arms and brought her to his mansion, and ever after was a father to her.

It was the dawn of a new life for them.

VICTOR

OWING MORE (Dec. 13).—Bob and Will Burnett are twins. Bob is working hard in Arizona, trying "to make a stake," while Will is doing his best to spend his patrimony in riotous living in Massachusetts.

Bob finally "strikes it rich" and, not having seen his native town of Rustville in six years, he decides to return home, and writes a telegram to Will to announce his coming. On second thought, however, he concludes he had better surprise his brother and so destroys the telegram and gets aboard the eastbound limited.

In the meantime Will has been having his troubles with his numerous creditors, and on the very day Bob is to arrive with his pockets stuffed with money, Will's affairs reach a climax. His morning's mail consists of a pile of urgent duns. His butler, his cook and his housemaid demand their wages. Will suavely hands each of them a twenty-five cent piece and escapes, leaving them raging. As he goes out of the house he is held up by his tailor, who demands payment of his bill. Escaping from the tailor by wily methods, Will runs into his grocer, his butcher, his haberdasher and his liquor dealer in turn, and manages only by the use of the utmost tact in getting away with a whole skin.

He visits his fiancee, the wealthy and beautiful Violet Ames, who is the only one who has a kind word for him. Even her father welcomes him most cordially. The Ames home is the only oasis in his desert. Violet has some new photographs, one of which she gives Will, writing upon it a most beautiful and touching sentiment in connection with her autograph. Leaving her with expressions of undying love, Will returns home, and then and there meets his Waterloo. No sooner does he arrive in his house than his "finish" begins. His servants come in with their baggage and tell him they are leaving. Before they have half completed the expressing of their private opinion of his methods, his other creditors, who have in the meantime held an indignation meeting, begin to arrive singly and in pairs. The angry crowd surge around him and threaten bodily harm. By a swift "side-step" Will escapes from them to his front hall, where he is suddenly confronted by two more angry creditors, who successfully block his exit, and the others, overtaking him, he is hauled back into his library wildly struggling for his liberty. Being thoroughly cornered and at bay, Will is compelled to think quickly, and thus hits upon, seemingly, the only method of escape left to him. He tells them he is engaged to marry a wealthy girl and that her father has promised to pay his debts as soon as he is married. This quiets the crowd, who believe in the truth of his statement, and they retire to the hallway, where the liquor dealer persuades the butcher to give him the name and address of the lady in question. The crowd then leave the house.

After thinking it carefully over, Will comes to the conclusion that he had better hurry up his marriage and sets out forthwith to call upon Violet. Arriving at her home he is ushered to the drawing-room, where he finds all his creditors assembled confronted by Violet and her father. Led on by the crafty liquor dealer the creditors have called upon Mr. Ames, told him of Will's statement, and informed him that they preferred their money at once. Imagine the result. Mr. Ames utterly repudiates Will and his claim, and orders him from the house, while Violet fairly scorns the ground he treads upon.

The only demand she makes upon him is that he return her photograph with the beautiful sentiment written upon it, and then quit her sight forever. The creditors, however, wish to see a great deal more of him and proceed to lay violent hands upon him. After a desperate fight, Will escapes again from his irate creditors and dashes for the railroad station, where he catches an outgoing train and fades from view.

But brother Bob steps from this same train and falls heir to all of Will's troubles, creditors and angry sweetheart seeking her photograph. His stormy life in Arizona seems but a peaceful dream besides the "welcome" he receives in Rustville. After numerous personal encounters with the creditors, the local constabulary, his brother's would-be father-in-law and fiancee, he finally manages to restore the village to its wonted calm, but he retains the photograph, after erasing Will's name and substituting his own.

THE AWAKENING OF JOHN BRIDD (Dec. 10).—John Bridd is a hard-hearted, close-fisted man, who lives alone and whose pet aversion is a woman. His home shows the severity and carelessness of the grouchy bachelor until a distant relative leaves a girl of tender years to him for protection. John hates the girl because she is a girl and does all in his power to inspire dislike on her part, but she falls in love with her guardian, and in every way tries to awaken in him that love she herself feels for him, but without avail. She gradually by wheedling and cajoling changes his home from barrenness to cosiness and comfort, and he gradually accedes to her wishes against himself. The women of the little town in which John lives have set their cap for him for years, because of his reputed wealth, but he has always stood them off, and now when this girl comes to live with him and continues to live there they are jealous and make life miserable for the girl. They tell her she is the talk of the village because she is living with this bachelor without a chaperon, and this drives the girl to desperation. She leaves a note stating her intentions and goes away alone. John returns and finds her gone, and then in a moment his loneliness seizes him and he learns what she means to him. He goes in search of her and finds her worn and tired and lost in the great woods, and there wins her back to him and shows her that she has been the one responsible for his great awakening.

MILANO

THE APACHE VOW (Dec. 14).—Eva, a former music hall singer, has married an aged noble for his wealth and social position. The aunt showers his wife with jewels and affection, but she, after several years of married life, barely tolerates her husband's caresses.

Lugi, a poor young mechanic, but handsome after a fashion, was the sweetheart of the Countess Eva. With the desire for a wife and home strong in his breast, it was only natural that he mated with a girl of his class, shortly after Eva's marriage to the Count D'Arti. Both Eva and Lugi were satisfied with their respective conditions in life, but fate ordained otherwise.

Being sent by his employer to make some small repairs at the Count's home, Lugi comes at dawn of day, accompanied by Nella, his wife, who elects to wait as the work promises to take but a short time.

Eva has just bid the guests at her reception adieu, when Lugi enters the drawing-room and prepares to proceed with his work. Recognition is mutual between the two former lovers, but fearing her husband will overhear them, bids Lugi be silent. There is no desire on Lugi's part to renew the acquaintance, even though encouraged to by Eva. The Countess, by a subterfuge gets Lugi into her apartment, when she plays upon his vanity, declaring he should not have married, but have waited for her as her husband was an old man and had not long to live.

Nella patiently waiting and wondering why Lugi stays so long, is broken-hearted to see her husband emerge from the Count's grounds by a side gate and affectionately bidding a richly-gowned and handsome woman adieu, recognizing her as Lugi's old sweetheart.

Nella steals away unobserved and gives way to her tears, meeting Rossa, an old acquaintance, who is a member of the underworld, an Apache chief.

Learning the cause of her grief, Rossa sends her cousin for Lugi, declaring he could never appreciate why she had married the man he considered merely a conceited fool.

Rossa suggests and endeavors to induce Nella to join his comrades and promises her a life of pleasure and indolence in place of hard work and sorrow. Nella cannot be influenced and, feeling she may have been hasty and misjudged the importance of Lugi's conduct, she returns home and does not let her husband know of her suspicions.

Lugi, filled with pride in the belief that he is beloved by the Countess, neglect Nella and finally even neglects to hide the fact that he pays clandestine visits to his former sweetheart and frankly tells his wife he no longer loves her. The Countess, while tolerating Lugi's secret visits, resents his presumption when he openly appears at her home while she has visitors, orders him away and bids him never to annoy her again.

Chagrined and with eyes opened to his folly, Lugi returns home, where a great surprise awaits him. Nella, unable to bear her neglect and humiliation, has left their home; a note to her husband informs him she has gone forever.

After weary searching, he finally learns that his wife has been seen with Rossa, and finally locates her in the Apache chief's haunt. But alas he is too late. He admits all his faults, pleads forgiveness, but all in vain. Nella silently indicates the great love she has for this man, but dare not openly admit it. She has taken the terrible Apache vow binding her for all time to the clan, and has just been tattooed over her heart with the emblem of loyalty.

Lugi attempts to drown his remorse in drugs and drink and becomes sullen and revengeful.

Meeting the Countess and her husband returning from the opera one night he follows their carriage and observes the Count leave Eva and enter his club.

His resentment inflamed, he plies himself with more drink and drugs to make himself forget, but instead a diabolical plan of revenge enters his mind.

He 'phones the Count at his club and informs him that his wife has a lover and that he can verify the fact by going home at once. Lugi, now half-crazed, forces an entrance into the apartment of the Countess, denounces her and tells her what he has done.

Eva pleads with him to go, offers him her jewels, but even if Lugi wished to heed her plea, it is beyond his power to do so, for in his half-drunken frenzy he had taken too liberal a portion of the drug and paid the penalty of his disloyalty by death. Eva also paid a price for the Count had been an interested, unobserved witness of the scene between Lugi and his wife. Furious with rage he orders her to hasten her departure from his home and presence forever.

At this time word is brought from Gorman that Lander's sheep are on the Bar B ranges, and he immediately starts with his men for the village with a placard warning the sheep men to remove their stock or expect trouble. The rival owners meet at the village saloon and trouble is narrowly averted by Hawkins, who takes Gorman with him out of the trouble zone. Pedro has heard the quarrel and determines to take advantage of it to revenge himself on Lander. He lies in wait for Lander and shoots him. The bullet passes through Lander's watch, stopping it at five fifteen. At the same time Gorman and Hawkins are together at the village. Pedro accuses Gorman of the crime the next day and he is arrested. Gorman tells Betty to telephone Hawkins to come and establish an alibi. This is overheard by Pedro, who cuts the telephone wires, but not before enough of the message has been received to start Hawkins on his return trip, from the Oak Crest Range, thirty miles away. In the meantime in the court room the preliminary examination is being held and Pedro is steadily inciting the sheep party to lynch Gorman. Hawkins pony-expresses the thirty miles and arrives in the courtroom just as the mob have placed the rope about Gorman's neck. The tables are turned and the cattle men decide to do a little lynching on their own account, and Pedro is dragged out.

ADAM AND EVE (Dec. 12).—God's ways are not man's ways, and there seems to be a natural variance between them. It was so with the first man and the first woman, and so it will ever be. The man, Adam, not content to be alone unto him, was given a woman, Eve. They dwell in happiness and peace, surrounded hy all the beauty of nature, and having all that is good for them. They are happy and content, until one day there comes to their home a tempter, a peddler. They take him in, feed and house him over night, and during his stay he shows them many trinkets, laces and other finery, which appeals to the woman's vanity and she begs her husband to buy them for her. His scant earnings as a gardener, although sufficient for themselves, cannot cater to the indulgence of luxuries, and he refuses. She pleads with him, and when the peddler retires for the night, Eve persuades Adam to steal from the peddler's pack that she may possess that which she craves.

Adam succumbs to her enticement and the seeds of sin are sown and their happiness and peace of mind depart from them from that time henceforth. In the morning, when the peddler leaves them, they would believe that their unhappiness had gone with him, but not so; they must reap that which they bave sown, and the disquieting spirit of evil hath taken possession of their hearts and home. When the peddler discovers that he has been robbed, he is fired with the spirit of revenge, and immediately reports his loss to the town authorities, who hasten to apprehend the culprits. On their way the news spreads among the townspeople, who pretend to be inspired with righteous indignation, but in reality they secretly rejoice in the downfall of their weak and foolish neighbors. Brought face to face with the peddler, Adam and Eve confess their guilt and the discovery of the stolen property at once convicts them. Banishment is the penalty of their crime.

Their tempter finds great satisfaction in the restoration of his property and rejoices in the punishment and misery of the victims of his temptations. Driven from their once happy home, with all their joys and bright hopes vanished, they become wanderers, seeking peace and finding none, trying to forget and always remembering the past. His solicitous parents are suddenly obliged to leave town and leave him under the care of a doctor and nurse.

Bridget, the cook, has diagnosed Freddie's case and concludes that she will take him in hand and administer a little physical culture to him. She throws all the physics to the dogs, hurling each and every bottle of it through the window. She drives the doctor from the house and tells the nurse to go about her business. Taking Freddie by the back of the neck, she sets him to work about the kitchen, scrubbing the floor, washing the dishes, and cleaning the stove. With her mental and physical dominion, tbis treatment gives Freddie an enormous appetite, and speedily he recovers from bis sickness.

The impeached doctor notifies Freddie's parents of Bridget's attitude and they return home post-haste, only to find their dear boy entirely recovered, with an appetite like a horse; feeling and looking quite like a real man, thanks to "Dr. Bridget," and her common-sense cure.

Young Ralph arrives and his father quarrels with him to such an extent that he leaves the house. As soon as he is gone the crook comes out. Morgan sees him and a struggle ensues, during which the old man is killed. The crook gets away, and when the butler enters he sees his master's body stretched upon the floor. Evidence all points to Ralph, whose quarrel with his father had been overheard by the servants. The boy is arrested and Jim Craig, the most prominent detective in New York, placed in charge of the case. While examining the house he finds his way into the secret room and notes the eyes cut out of the picture. In the dust near this picture he sees the imprint of an old signet ring. This is his clue. On a rod of the iron fence there is a bit of cloth torn from the crook's coat. This is all Craig has to work on. Passing a tailoring shop he sees a bellhoy going in to have a suit mended. He sees that the material is the same as the piece he holds. He enters the hotel and disguises himself as a waiter. In the dining room that night he sees a certain crook whom he has been watching for some time. As he bends over him to hand him the menu he notes the ring upon his finger. In the station house the crook is forced to confess and Ralph is set free to return to his wife.

SOLAX

FIVE EVENINGS (Dec. 20).—Parents are often to blame for their boys and girls going wrong, because, through carelessness or ignorance, they do not make their home life meet the needs of growing children.

This was the case with the Crawley family. Mr. Crawley smoked and read his paper in the evening. His wife read or embroidered. They did not like to be disturbed. Tom Crawley, forbidden to go out evenings, went up to bed, ostensibly, and crawled out of the window. When Jessie's friends came to see her, no one had a good time.

Affairs were in this condition when Aunt Lucy arrived. Aunt Lucy was a woman of rare insight and sympathy with young people. She won Jessie's heart from the first, and between them they turned the house into a gay and lively place. Even father and mother were stirred out of their accustomed habits, and felt quite young again. But Tom was harder to win. He continued to sneak away nights until, through Aunt Lucy, father saw how near he had come to losing his boy, and Tom was saved from disgrace.

GREAT NORTHERN

HIS FIRST PATIENT (Dec. 14).—Dr. Buchan is a young physician, who finds it difficult to build up a practice although he had been graduated with the highest of honors. In the course of time he wins the good favor of Mrs. Claen, a society leader, and is invited to one of her receptions. There he meets Alice Prop, the daughter of a rich manufacturer. The two are mutually attracted to each other, and inasmuch as her father had left earlier in the evening to transact business out of town, Alice accepts the young doctor's invitation to partake of luncheon at his home. No sooner had they departed than the girl's father appears at the home of Mrs. Claen in quest of his daughter. He is informed that she has accompanied Dr. Buchan, and immediately starts for the home of the physician. Fearing a complication, Mrs. Claen telephones the doctor and warns him that the father of Alice is on his way to escort her home. The young physician puzzles his wits for a solution of the dilemma and finally hits upon the plan of having Alice feign illness. When her father arrives on the scene she apparently is suffering greatly, and her father, becoming alarmed, orders a private ambulance to convey her to the family home. Dr. Buchan is urged to accompany them, and for several days he is in constant attendance upon the young woman with whom he has fallen in love. There are many ardent love scenes, of which the father is in total ignorance, and finally the young physician resolves to make a bold front and ask the wealthy merchant for the hand of his daughter. It is with considerable fear and trembling that he faces the issue, but after a brief interview, the father gives his consent. At this juncture Alice tells her father of the deception that had been played and asks forgiveness. Pater is inclined to be rebellious at the outset, but relents in the end and wishes them long life and happiness.

ESSANAY

THE ERROR OF OMISSION (Dec. 13).—Tommy Lawton is born into the world and his father, one of the common type of careless parents, neglects to register his birth certificate in the flurry resulting from having a young bull pup sent to him by a friend. The dog is registered at once, however, and the contrast of the two registry offices is startling. Before the dog registry office a huge crowd clamor for attention from the overworked clerks, while at the birth registry counter the clerks yawn and nod over their neglected books. Tommy grows into a sturdy lad, and his father has the greatest difficulty in securing him a place in the public school because of his birth never having been registered. At the age of fourteen, Tommy is left alone in the world by the death of his father and is unable to look for employment. The years pass on and Tommy is now a young man in love with pretty Eva Cushman. Feeling himself of age, and desiring to cast his vote for a staunch friend of Eva's father, Tammy tries to register at the polls, but is challenged because of his youthful appearance, and, not being able to prove his age, is turned away. Later, he endeavors to secure a marriage license, but it is the old story—he cannot prove his age and is rejected. One morning he receives a letter advising that he has inherited a fortune if he can prove his identity. Again the neglect of registering his birth almost loses Tommy the fortune until be happens to discover his father's old dog registration paper, on the back of which is carelessly scribbled: "Also became the father of a fine, bouncing boy on this date." With this scrape of good luck, Tommy hurries to the lawyer, proves his identity by revealing an odd birthmark on his neck, and is rewarded with the money.

"ALKALI' IKE'S MOTORCYCLE (Dec. 14).—One night all the boys of the Seven Up ranch are invited to the house to meet Bud Simpson's niece from Lizardhead. Alkali Ike vainly attempts to elbow his way through and get a sight of the fair Soffie, but in vain, and is finally thrown out of the house by the boys. But his wooing is not in vain and, the next morning, a motorcyclist arrives at the ranch and stops a while. Alkali immediately sees possibilities in the machine, buys it outright, and invites Soffie to take a spin with him along the trail. She delightfully agrees—and then the fun begins. Of course Alkali loses control of the mechanism and the wildest of rides ensue. Finally the machine lands in the creek, and there we leave Alkali in the hands of the enraged Soffie, who does things good and plenty to him.

THE BABY AND THE COP (Dec. 19).—On the same reel as ROUGH ON RATS.—Mrs. Brown thinks that she has the prettiest baby in the world but everybody knows that it is a poor puny little girls with no claim to beauty. A doctor makes a great discovery in the form of a tonic to be placed in the baby's milk. Mrs. Brown gives the tonic to her baby and it starts to grow at a wonderful rate. The nurse takes baby out for an airing and while she is having a little flirtation it grows to be a plump three hundred pound wonder and gets lost in the park. A diminutive policeman finds it and has his own troubles getting it home to its surprised mother and relatives. Nettie Grant as the baby and little Herbert Rice as the cop supply the laughs over the ludicrous situations resulting.

WANTED A HUSBAND (Dec. 26).—On the same reel as THE DEVIL OF A TIME.—After her first husband dies Mrs. Murphy decides to find one that she can boss as she is tired of being told what to do. She advertises for a small frail man with matrimonial inclinations and is delighted when Herbert Rice applies for the job. Rice is made to walk the chalk line and Mrs. Murphy-Rice makes up for all the abuse she received from her first husband by abusing husband number two. But a diet ordered by her doctors to reduce her weight has a wonderful effect upon her size and she continues to shrink until her husband, who is taking a special course in physical culture, becomes the Bull Moose of his own pasture and the real fun begins.

By Ralph Knaster

The Moving Picture Machine Operators Union of New York, Local No. 1, held their last regular meeting Monday night, December 2, 1912, at Teutonia Hall, No. 66 Essex street, New York. The meeting was called to order by Bro. Pres. Roht. Goldblatt at 12:30 A. M. The worthy president was welcomed with cheers and applause as this was the first meeting since his return from the A. F. of L. convention at Rochester. After giving his report of that event, another tremendous applause greeted the chairman, and every member present, numbering 280, commented upon his (Goldblatt's) untiring efforts and trials for his fellow craftsmen to get what is due them and what they deserve. One of the main things which occurred during the meeting was the reading of a letter from an operator who is not a member of the organization, but was in very had circumstances and met with an accident causing him to lose his leg. A collection was made for this unfortunate operator and quite a sum was made up to send him so that it may help toward getting an artificial leg that it may enable him to get around again to find work. The name of this unfortunate operator is suppressed, but the hoys wish him best of prosperity and good health for the future. Five new memhers were obligated and twice that number of applications were placed before the body for approval.

A vote of thanks was given to the central body of White Plains, N. Y., for their impartial decision which was rendered in the favor of No. 1.

Also a vote of thanks to Brother Alfred H. Saunders, editor of the Moving Picture News, for the grand assistance he has rendered through the use of the columns of his paper. The reading of the finances of the organization proved there is great progress.

Six memhers were appointed to comprise the new examining board, with Brother A. Kessler chairman. It was decided to keep the same executive officers of the organization in power until after the hall, which takes place on February 10, 1913, at Palm Garden. The committee that investigated the charges against Brother Jack Garlick hrought in a report upon which the members or body voted to expel him.

Report of the ball committee was that great progress is being made, and as things are going on this affair will be a great success.

The meeting closed at 3:30 A. M.

The business representative of the Moving Picture Machine Operators Union No. 1 gained a great point in the cause of bettering conditions for several men employed in various houses controlled hy Mr. N. Hirsch, particularly his theatres on Sixth avenue. The representative was informed that Mr. Hirsch was using very mean and unjust tactics toward the operators he employs for his own selfish desire. The union schedule in those particular theatres call for two operators, as the tbeatres open at 9 A. M. and close shortly before midnight. The men to work in shifts, each man working seven hours and the salary agreed was $21.00 each man per week. An agreement was signed to this effect last year hy the former auxiliary and the proprietor.

The union representative was notified tbat Mr. Hirsch was not paying some of tbe men the schedule and under tbreat of dismissal the men had to keep this a secret. The representative called on Mr. Hirsch at his office on Sixth avenue last Saturday and a new agreement was signed. This did not seem to suffice Mr. Hirsch, who wanted to make changes in order to get men to whom be explained that he would pay them $18.00 per week and said to them my hook will show $21.00; the union won't know what you really get. But such tactics will not be tolerated in the M. P. Operators Union No. 1, which represents four hundred of the highest class projection operators in this metropolis. The representative called again on Mr. Hirsch on Tuesday, December 3, 1912, and told him that these tactics must he stopped, as the men working for him are competent and fulfill all their duties, and if this was his only cause to make changes, simply to take a few dollars from the pockets or salaries of the working men and offer a starvation salary or take away bread and hutter from the mouths of those innocent ones that depend upon their elders for support or existence, that the M. P. Operators Union No. 1 of New York will take immediate action. Mr. Hirsch admitted that all operators employed upon his circuit are experts and was satisfied to keep them for the future and pay them the scale.

Now, hrother craftsmen, if, however, you take a smaller salary and sign a hook or receipt for more than you receive, you only fool your ownself and families that depend upon you for a livelihood and cause others much pain and trouble; also don't forget that you are hreaking the most holy and solemn oath that you have pledged in your organization, and thus you are nothing more than a contemptible perjurer having sworn falsely, and you deserve no sympathy from any organization. This proves to the operator the meaning of organizations, and the benefit of them. Now, to the operator who wishes to better his conditions, join the M. P. Operators Union of Greater New York, Local No. 1, for then your troubles will be theirs and their trouhles will he yours, and fight shoulder to shoulder like a man to get what you justly deserve, and beyond all shadows of any doubt you will surely get that.

Applications for memhership can be made at the office of the union, 133 Third avenue, New York City, between the hours of 9:30 A. M. and 2 P. M. daily. Our employment office is open from 9:30 A. M. to 5 P. M.

CALDER JOHNSTONE IN THE MORNING TELEGRAPH SAYS:

"The Paralytic"

SOLAX—NOV. 27TH.

One of the strongest dramatic situations presented in pictures is here disclosed when a paralytic is made the victim of the villain's plotting and the rival lover is thrown down a well in sigbt of the helpless man, who is the father of the girl whom both the villain and the rival love. In other words, the paralytic is the father of the girl, the lover is seized by men in the hire of the villain and is cast into the well, while the father looks on helpless to act or tell of the dastardly act. It works out in the end in a surprisingly dramatic manner, and the whole story is one of melodramatic qualities that is certain to he enjoyed.

PRECISION—Quality or state of being precise; exact limitation; exactness; accuracy; definiteness.—Webster's Dictionary.

All that Webster says—and more—you will find in the

Simplex

We have the DESIGN and also the MATERIAL in the Simplex, without which the PRECISION would be of no use.

Considered from every point of view, it is truly a remarkable motion picture machine. In justice to yourself, Mr. Exhibitor, you should investigate its merits. Read what one of our many satisfied users has to say about it.

"I want to say that a part of my success in this town, which was a hard proposition to get in on, has been due to the perfect projected picture which is possible with the Simplex. I have used a Simplex for fourteen months, and it has been that many months of satisfaction and perfect curtain results, and I think I am in a position to know what a good projected picture is. I wish to say this as a closing remark for the Simplex: It will do anything any other machine will do and it will do it easier and better."

A QUESTION OF PATENTS

INSTEAD of my usual editorial, I have used the following from Messrs. Kenyon & Kenyon as giving, in their own phraseology, the facts of the situation:

On Monday, December 2, 1912, the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia handed down a decision declaring the Edison Film Reissue patent No. 12192 invalid and void for want of patentability. This was in a suit by the Motion Picture Patents Company against the Chicago Film Exchange, which had been brought in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia in June, 1909, for infringement of claim 2 of Edison Reissue patent, which called for:

> "2. An unbroken transparent or translucent tape-like photographic film provided with perforated edges and having thereon uniform sharply defined equidistant photographs of successive positions of an object in motion as observed from a single point of view at rapidly recurring intervals of time, such photographs being arranged in a continuous straight line sequence, unlimited in number save by the length of the film, and sufficient in number to represent the movements of the object throughout an extended period of time, substantially as described,"

that being the film now universally used in all moving picture cameras. The case was argued before the Hon. Wendell P. Stafford, of that court, in May, 1911. Judge Stafford took the case under advisement for six months, and then he entered a decree for the complainant, holding the patent valid and infringed, and ordering an accounting and costs in the usual way. Thereupon the defendant appealed the case and the decision just rendered is the outcome of that appeal.

This decision is the outcome of a long and bitter fight between the Motion Picture Patents Company and the so-called Independents, and the Independents have won the day, there being no appeal from this decision. The suit was begun in June, 1909, against the Chicago Film Exchange, an Illinois corporation having its principal place of business in Chicago, but also having a selling agency in Washington. A similar suit was started in Chicago at about the same time against the Independent Moving Pictures Company of America, of which company Mr. Carl Laemmle was and is the president, he being also the president of the Imp Films Company of New York and vice-president of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company of New York, and president of the Laemmle Film Service, carrying on an extensive business in connection with the rental of films in Chicago and many other cities. Mr. Laemmle at first conducted the defense of these suits himself through Mr. John W. Munday, a well-known patent lawyer of Chicago, but about two years ago, when the Independent manufacturers, including Mr. Laemmle, assumed control of the defense, Messrs. Kenyon & Kenyon, of 49 Wall street, New York, the general counsel for the Independents, took up the defense, in conjunction with Mr. Munday, and carried it through to the finish. The case was argued before Judge Stafford by Mr. Melville Church, of Washington, for the complainant, and by Mr. William Houston Kenyon and the Hon. William J. Wallace, of New York, for the defendant. The case came up for argument on appeal on October 10th and 11th of this year, and was argued for the appellant by Mr. Wm. Houston Kenyon and Hon. William J. Wallace, and for the appellee by Mr. Melville Church and Mr. Frederick P. Fish.

The decision is of a sweeping character, and finally decides against the claims of Mr. Edison to be the inventor of the film used in moving picture machines of the present day. The Court, in its decision, says in part as follows:

"The claims of the reissue are the result of an attempt to overcome the effect of the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals, 114 Fed., 926. Edison is not the inventor of film described in claim 2, and his patent, therefore, is invalid. The film was neither discovered nor produced by Edison. It was brought to its present state of perfection by Eastman. Edison seized upon it and provided it with perforations along the edges at regular intervals. Perforations had been previously made in photographic films for feeding purposes. So far our conclusion is the same substantially as that of the C. C. A., in which claim 5 of the original patent, and incidentally claim 6, were under consideration. The problems Edison solved were in the camera apparatus, wherein his true claim to invention lies. His film was the invention of others. It is the particular arrangement of the pictures for which Edison is entitled to credit. For these pictures and their arrangement are nothing more than the result of the operation of his improved camera apparatus.

"The invention of Edison was exhausted in the construction of the camera which enables photographs of moving objects to be taken upon the Eastman film in the uniform and satisfactory manner justly claimed for them. The pictures are the direct result of the mechanism of the camera with the Eastman film mechanically adapted to and applied therein.

"In our opinion, claim 2 of the reissue patent 12192 is unpatentable and void; and the decree must be reversed with costs, and the cause remanded with directions to dismiss the bill. Reversed. Signed.

"THE CHIEF JUSTICE."

Chicago Film Exchange, Appellant,) vs.) No. 2400.
Motion Picture Patents Company.)

This is an appeal from a decree on a bill by the Motion Picture Patents Company, a corporation of the State of New Jersey, against Chicago Film Exchange, a corporation of the State of Illinois, doing business in the city of Washington, for the infringement of a patent to Thomas A. Edison for a photographic film, declaring claim 2 of said patent valid, its infringement by the defendant, and granting an injunction against its further infringement, together with an order of reference to take an account of damages. The pleadings are in the usual form and were not excepted to.

It appears that Thomas A. Edison, on August 24, 1891, applied for a patent for a photographic camera and film and received the same, No. 589,168, on August 31, 1897. Claims 1, 2, 3 and 4 of this were for the camera apparatus, and claims 5 and 6 covered the films used therein. Claims 5 and 6 read as follows:

"5. An unbroken transparent or translucent tape-like photographic film, having thereon equidistant photographs of successive positions of an object in motion, all taken from the same point of view, such photographs being arranged in a continuous straight line sequence, unlimited in number save by the length of the film, substantially as described.

"6. An unbroken transparent or translucent tape-like photographic film provided with perforated edges and having thereon equidistant photographs of successive positions of an object in motion, all taken from the same point of view, such photographs being arranged in a continuous straight line sequence, unlimited in number save by the length of the film, substantially as described."

A suit was brought by the patentee in the United States Circuit Court for the Southern District of New York against the American Mutoscope Company for the infringement of the said patent. From a decree sustaining the bill (110 Fed., 660) an appeal was taken to the Circuit Court of Appeals for the second circuit, where the decree was reversed and the bill dismissed. 114 Fed., 926.

The Court found that Edison was not the first to devise a camera for taking negatives of objects in motion and at a rate sufficiently rapid to result in persistence of vision, but that the specific type of his apparatus was not disclosed in the prior art; that while Edison's predecessors were at work during the transition period from plates to flexible paper, and from the paper to celluloid films, they nevertheless left no new principle to be discovered, and no essentially new form of machine to be invented in order to make the latest improved photographic material available for the purpose; that Edison, by perfecting the first apparatus for using this film, immediately met all the conditions necessary to commercial success; but that this did not entitle him to a monopoly of all camera apparatus for using the film. The conclusion was that while he had made an invention, it was not the broad one of his apparatus claims. The fifth claim, for the film, it was said, "is obviously an attempt by the patentee to obtain a monopoly of the product of the apparatus described in the patent, so that in the event it should turn out that his apparatus was not patentable, or the product could be made by apparatus not infringing his, he could nevertheless enjoy the exclusive right of making it."

Claim 6, which differed from claim 5 only by the insertion of the words "provided with perforated edges," in describing the film, was not discussed.

Compelled to accept this decree as final by the denial of a writ of certiorari, Edison applied for a reissue, dividing his application. The reissue patent for the apparatus, having four claims, was subsequently declared valid save as to claim 4. 151 Fed., 767. He also received a reissue, No. 12,038, after some objections and amendments, with the two following claims:

"1. An unbroken transparent or translucent tape-like photographic film having thereon uniform sharply defined photographs of successive positions of an object in motion, as observed from a single point of view, at rapidly recurring intervals of time, such photographs being arranged in a continuous straight line sequence, unlimited in number save by the length of the film, and sufficient in number to represent the movements of the objects throughout an extended period of time, substantially as described.

"2. An unbroken transparent or translucent tape-like photographic film provided with perforated edges and having thereon uniform sharply defined photographs of successive positions of an object in motion, as observed from a single point of view, at rapidly recurring intervals of time, such photographs being arranged in a continuous straight line sequence, unlimited in number save by the length of the film, and sufficient in number to represent the movements of the object throughout an extended period of time, substantially as described."

This patent was surrendered and a reissue applied for on December 17, 1903, the applicant stating that the word "equidistant" had been inadvertently omitted as defining and explaining the word "uniform" used in the description of the photographic film in the claims of the first reissue. Reissued patent No. 12,192 was then obtained, with the claims 1 and 2 as follows:

"1. An unbroken transparent or translucent tape-like photographic film having thereon uniform sharply defined equidistant photographs of successive position of an object in motion, as observed from a single point of view, at rapidly recurring intervals of time, such photographs being arranged in a continuous straight line sequence, unlimited in number save by the length of the film, and sufficient in number to represent the movements of the object throughout an extended period of time, substantially as described.

"2. An unbroken transparent or translucent tape-like photographic film provided with perforated edges and having thereon uniform sharply defined equidistant photographs of successive positions of an object in motion, as observed from a single point of view, at rapidly recurring intervals of time, such photographs being arranged in a continuous straight line sequence, unlimited in number save by the length of the film, and sufficient in number to represent the movements of the object throughout an extended period of time, substantially as described."

The only difference in these claims is that No. 2 contains the words "provided with perforated edges," inserted after the word film in the second line.

Infringement of both claims was charged in this suit, but the decree was founded on claim 2, which is the preferred one of the patent. Following the language heretofore quoted relating to the attempt made through claim 5 of the original patent (hereinabove set out), it was said by the Circuit Court of Appeals (114 Fed., 926):

"A claim for an article of manufacture is not invalid merely because the article is the product of a machine, whether the machine is patented or unpatented; but it is invalid unless the article is new in a patentable sense, that is, unless its original production involved invention as distinguished from ordinary mechanical skill. If it is new only in the sense that it embodies and represents superior workmanship, or is an improvement upon an old article in degree and excellence, within all authorities the claim is invalid. Hatch vs. Moffett, 15 Fed. Rep., 252; Worcester vs. Calhoun, 11 Blatch, 215; Excelsior Needle Co. vs. Union Needle Co., 32 Fed. Rep., 221; Smith vs. Nichols, 21 Wall., 112; Risdon Locomotive Works vs. Medart, 150 U. S., 79. * * * The film was not new, and if the other characteristics of the product are not new, or are new only in the sense that they add to the article merely a superiority of finish or a greater accuracy of detail, the claim is destitute of patentable novelty."

The claims of the reissue are the result of an attempt to overcome the effect of that decision. Answering an objection in the office that there was no necessity for the complete description of the camera apparatus, the applicant said: "We also think it desirable that the complete apparatus should be described, because the differences which distinguish applicant's film from prior films are largely due to the features of novelty in the apparatus." The following is extracted from the deposition of Thomas A. Edison, taken in the case against the American Mutoscope Company and used in evidence in this case:

175 X Q. Why do you suppose you did not refer in any of your caveats to the character or composition of material of the film which you used in any of the forms of apparatus for taking or reproducing photographs of an object in motion?

A. I don't know why I did not. I was not interested in the manufacturing or making of the photographic material.

176 X Q. Did you not regard the film, then, as a thing of your invention?

A. No, I did not regard the film as a part of my invention, no, sir; I looked to the people who made it for that.

177 X Q. You consider your invention to be in the apparatus which you had designed for producing the illusion of motion?

A. I was trying to do for the eye what the phonograph was doing for the ear, and to make it commercial.

178 X Q. After you had conceived of that idea, the selection of material was not a matter of invention, although it might have been difficult?

A. Well, I don't know about that. Our experiments showed that we had to have peculiar material, especially when we were on the microphotographs, as we could not get any definition with paper and things like that; we had to get some glassy surface. The microphotographs shown with microscopes are very nicely defined, and even a hundred figures are shown under a microscope, and all the details come out sharp, but these are taken by some means that I don't know of, but taken at very low speed, and the surface seems to be perfect, whereas the only surface we could get was very warty and irregular, and we could not bring out any details whatever when the picture was extremely small. * * *

183 Re-D. Q. On cross-examination you referred to the requisites of the film for your 1889 apparatus as being toughness and transparency. Did you include the requisite for the surface, the sensitive surface, of such a film?

A. No, I did not, but that was one of the things that we got the photograph people to work on to give us the maximum sensibility, because we were very short of light, and, as we were taking photographs at a very rapid rate, we had to have something extremely sensitive, and they made us a special film, different from the film that we printed on; that is to say, different from the positives, and this special film was made extremely sensitive, so that the smallest amount of light would produce great results, and we at first did not get them very sensitive, but they, by working on them, made them extremely sensitive, so that with the small amount of light we had, they were quite satisfactory after they had experimented on them.

W. K. L. Dickson, who was the principal assistant of Edison in perfecting his apparatus, as a witness for the plaintiff, said that after constructing the apparatus, using the heavy, thick celluloid material of Carbutt, with the toothed edge for feeding, he interviewed George Eastman, of Rochester, who was working to produce long sheets of films for his spool camera, and told him of the great importance of producing such a film. After receiving a sample of this new film, the witness showed it to Edison, who jumped out of his seat and said: "We have got it. Now work like ——." Later, longer strips of this film were procured from Eastman. Owing to some imperfections in the emulsion, the film did not give complete satisfaction, and Eastman labored to overcome the defects, finally succeeding.

Passing by the discussion relating to the reissue and the limitations claimed to have been placed upon the claim by the proceedings in the Patent Office, we come to the question whether Edison was the inventor in the sense of the patent law of the article of manufacture described in claim 2 of reissue patent No. 12,192. "A manufacture is an entity distinct from the substances of which it is composed and from the instruments or art by which it is produced." 1 Robinson Pat. Sec., 184. "Articles of manufacture may be new in the commercial sense, when they are not new in the sense of the patent law. New articles of commerce are not patentable as new manufactures unless it appears in a given case that the production of the new article involved the exercise of invention or discovery beyond what was necessary to construct the apparatus for its manufacture or production. Nothing short of invention or discovery will support a patent for a manufacture any more than for an art, machine or composition of matter." Collar Co. vs. Van Dusen, 23 Wall, 530,563. "A patentable invention is a mental result. It must be new and shown to be of patentable utility. Everything within the dominion of the conception belongs to him who conceived it. The machine, process or product is but its material reflex and embodiment. A new idea may be engrafted upon an old invention, be distinct from the conception which preceded it, and be an improvement. In such case, it is patentable. * * * But a carrying forward, or new or more extended application of the original thought, a change only in form, proportions or degree, the substitution of equivalents, doing substantially the same thing in the same way by substantially the same means, with better results, is not such invention as will sustain a patent." Smith vs. Nichols, 21 Wall., 112-118.

Sometimes improvements in a product, owing to skill of workmanship or the perfection of machinery, consists of superiority of finish, greater accuracy of detail, and result in increased commercial value, but they do not thereby become patentable. Smith vs. Nichols, 21 Wall., 112-119; Risdon Locomotive Works vs. Medart, 158 U. S., 68-81; Glue Co. vs. Upton, 97 U. S., 36. Applying those rules to the condition of this case, we are of the opinion that plaintiff's assignor, Thomas A. Edison, is not the inventor of the film described in claim 2 and that his patent therefor is invalid. The flexible, transparent or translucent tape-like film prepared for taking photographs was neither discovered nor produced by Edison. It was improved and brought into its present state of perfection by Eastman. When exhibited to Edison, he seized upon it as the thing needed to make his camera apparatus a complete commercial success. He provided it with perforations along the edges at regular intervals, into which the teeth of ratchet wheels of the camera entered to give it the required motion; a mechanical contrivance to adapt it to the performance of the functions of the machine. This co-operation of the rows of holes with the teeth of moving wheels he had described in a caveat of 1889 as similar to that in the Wheatstone telegraph instrument, for insuring a positive motion of the band. Moreover, perforations had been previously made in photographic films for feeding purposes. See Reynaud's French Patent. So far, our conclusion is the same substantially as that of the Circuit Court of Appeals in the decision before referred to, in which claim 5 of the original patent and, incidentally, claim 6, were under consideration.

It is further contended that the film of the present patent claim has been invested with new and substantial qualities, by reason of the distinct, uniform, equidistant photographs taken of moving objects, which, when the negative strip is converted into a positive, can be passed in the same manner through the exhibiting machine and give a lifelike representation of the moving objects, never before obtained. In the course of their argument, counsel for plaintiff (appellee) say: "In a word, the film produced by Mr. Edison and described minutely and with accuracy in his patent represents a practical embodiment of all the elements necessary to complete and perfect practice of the motion picture art as we know it to-day. No detail seems to have escaped him; no problem growing out of the largest conception of the taking and exhibiting of photographs of moving objects in a lifelike and natural manner seems to have baffled his solution. In saying this we do not mean to say that Mr. Edison, in the patent in suit, foreclosed all further improvements in his camera and in his exhibiting machine, but we do say that this record fully proves that he did supply all of the fundamentals of the film that is used in the art as practiced to-day."

We do not dissent from the proposition that Mr. Edison solved the problems of the motion picture art with great ingenuity and skill, but the problems that he solved were in the camera apparatus, wherein his true claim to invention lies. He did not supply the "fundamentals of the film" that is used in the art as practiced to-day. The long, pliant, translucent, celluloid film, with the sensitized surface, was the invention and improvement of others. The pictures taken on such a film are photographs. It is the particular character and arrangement of those pictures for which Mr. Edison is entitled to credit. But those pictures and their arrangement are nothing more than the result of the operation of his improved camera apparatus. The problem that was solved by their production and arrangement was a problem of the camera machinery. Appreciating this, he insisted, as we have seen, that the complete apparatus should be described, "because the differences which distinguished applicant's film from the prior films are largely due to the features of novelty in the apparatus." Also, in explaining why he had not referred in any of his numerous caveats to the character of the film, he said that he was not interested in manufacturing photographic material, and did not regard the film as part of his invention; he looked to the people who made it for that. It seems also that while his original application was filed August 24, 1891, the claims for the film were not made until December 28, 1896, in an amendment filed that day. The conversion of this negative film strip into a positive for use in an exhibiting apparatus was affected by one of the familiar processes of the photographic art.

The invention of Edison was exhausted in the construction of the camera which enabled the photographs of moving objects to be taken upon the Eastman film in the distinct, uniform and satisfactory manner justly claimed for them. The pictures are the direct result of the mechanism of the camera, with the Eastman film mechanically adapted to and applied therein

In our opinion, claim 2 of reissue patent No. 12,192 is unpatentable and void; and the decree must be reversed, with costs, and the cause remanded with direction to dismiss the bill.

By far the most attractive and distinguished group of Indians who have ever visited Chicago are the band of Blackfeet chiefs who were brought there for the occasion by Louis Hill, chairman of the board of directors of the Great Northern railroad. This was the first time that they had ever been off their reservation, which is located in the Glacier National Park.

With them is the famous cowboy band from Montana, and "Bill" Pruitt, the "Cowboy Caruso." Their visit to Chicago was the outcome of a desire on the part of the Indians to thank Mr. W. N. Selig, president of the Selig Polyscope Company, for the work that he is doing in preserving the red men and their traditions and customs for the generations to come.

EXPOSITION EXECUTIVE OFFICES ARE OPENED

On Friday, November 29th, the committee who have charge of the First International Exposition of the motion picture art held their first meeting in their new quarters on the second floor of the German Bank building, Fourth avenue and Fourteenth street, New York City. It was then decided, upon President Neff's suggestion, to add more members of the committee, therefore B. E. Cornell, of Syracuse, was appointed to the general committee and Messrs. R. M. Davidson, of Binghamton; G. F. Wright, of Albany; William Douque, of Utica; A. N. Wolff, of Rochester; E. M. Day, of Auburn, and R. C. Whitten, of New York City, to the advisory committee, it being President Neff's idea to have the up-state branches of the League represented on the committee.

Several of the gentlemen from up-state have already written to Secretary Samuels that they would do all in their power to further the interests of the exposition and the convention, and that they would attend all the meetings possible. Several meetings were held during the past week and committees were appointed to call on the largest film manufacturers in the East. It is thought by all the committee and by all those who have been interviewed, that it is time the public were shown more about the mechanism of Cinematography. No business in the history of the world has grown with the rapidity of the motion picture industry, and it is fully expected that this exposition will eclipse any trade exposition ever held.

Many manufacturers of articles pertaining to the moving picture art have already inquired regarding the price of space. The main floor space of the New Grand Central Palace will be sold at $2 per square foot for the preferred positions, and $1.50 per square foot for the remainder. The mezzanine floor at $1.50 per square foot. These rental prices include counters, backs, coverings and sign; or platform, back, rails and sign. This property is owned by the International Exposition Co., and will be furnished free to the exhibitors, the idea being to keep the exhibits uniform and thus add to the dignity of the Exposition.

PRESIDENT NEFF KEEPS BUSY

Who is the most energetic man in the exhibitors' end of the film business to-day? We do not know of one who can put it over on M. A. Neff when it comes to expounding on the advantages of co-operation; therefore it is that tremendous success attends the organization meetings all over the country at which Mr. Neff presides.

The following is a brief report of the organization meetings at Des Moines, Ia., and Omaha, Neb.:

President Neff arrived in Des Moines, Ia., early the morning of December 3, and was met by Mr. Fred Young, of Cedar Rapids. The convention was called to order at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, with a hearty welcome to all. The speaking lasted until after 5 o'clock, and membership was taken for the new organization.

At night a splendid entertainment was held in the big hall at the Savoy Hotel. After this splendid entertainment, the exhibitors and their friends adjourned until 10 o'clock Tuesday morning, when an executive session of the members who had joined the organization was held. President Neff again addressed the exhibitors. In the afternoon a permanent organization was perfected and the following officers were elected: J. L. Obrien, Oelwein, president; F. Young, Cedar Rapids, secretary; J. E. Tierney, Sioux City, treasurer; J. S. Bassett, Independence, first vice-president; M. Dewey, Chariton, second vice-president; Thomas A. Brown, Iowa, national vice-president.

At night, when the business of the day had been completed, a large banquet was held in the spacious dining room of the Savoy Hotel, where one hundred persons partook of the good things. Great credit is due Mr. Fred Young, of Cedar Rapids, Ia. He seems to be possessed of wonderful ability in conducting conventions and arranging for entertainments. Everything went off just as smoothly as though they had had many years to prepare for it, instead of a very short notice. The next state convention will be held in Des Moines, Ia., on the last Tuesday in May.

Following the organization of Iowa exhibitors, Mr.

Neff boarded a Rock Island train for Omaha, Neb., accompanied by Mr. Frost, of Atlanta; Mr. Fred Young, of Cedar Rapids, Ia.; Mr. Julius Singer, of Des Moines; Mr. C. E. Wirick, of Sioux City, and several other Iowa exhibitors, arriving in Omaha on Wednesday, December 4.

When they alighted from the train, a wild western blizzard was blowing. They were met by Mr. J. S. Schlank, of Omaha, and W. H. Rubert, who was waiting with Mr. Schlank's automobile to take them to the Rome Hotel, where a large number of Nebraska motion picture exhibitors were waiting. The Omaha meeting was opened soon after their arrival, and President Neff spoke for about two hours, explaining in an open meeting the benefits to be derived. The spirit of fair play and western progressiveness was displayed both at Des Moines and Omaha. All of the film exchanges were represented, friendly and ready to assist in making the convention a grand success.

On the night of December 6 a grand banquet was given at the Rome Hotel. The banquet hall was beautifully decorated; flowers and beautiful ladies in plenty graced the occasion. Everybody seemed to be imbued with the spirit of the occasion, and it was one grand affair. Vaudeville and pictures, a banquet and a general good time wound up the Omaha convention.

The following are the names of the officers elected to preside over the Nebraska state organization: President, W. F. Stoecker, Omaha, Neb.; first vice-president, P. L. McCarthy, Grand Island, Neb.; second vice-president, J. W. Ballinger, York, Neb.; secretary, E. C. Preston, Superior, Neb.; treasurer, W. A. Walden, Hastings, Neb.; national vice-president, J. E. Schlank, Omaha, Neb.

In company with the newly elected president, Mr. Stoecker, and the national vice-president, Mr. Schlank, Mr. Neff visited many places of interest in Omaha, and left for Kansas City December 7, via the Burlington, at 10:45 p. m.

BAR JOHNSON WEDDING FILMS

At a special meeting, Wednesday, December 4, of the St. Louis branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, which comprises the owners of all the motion-picture theatres in St. Louis, the members showed their disapproval by passing a resolution condemning any reel that will show the marriage of the negro pugilist, Jack Johnson, and his white wife. Consequently, no theatre in St. Louis will exhibit this reel.

Another matter taken up was the refusal of the league to accept a coupon admission scheme that a large tobacco company of New York is trying to promote.

With each package of cigarettes sold, a coupon with a small cash value is enclosed, and a given number of these coupons entitles the holder to admission to any picture show. These coupons in turn are redeemable by the tobacco company on a cash basis.

The league looked upon this sort of a proposition as having a tendency to create a bad habit of smoking cigarettes by the younger generation.

The object of this league is to protect the public against such matters and to encourage along educational lines by producing the very best motion pictures of subjects that will make a moving-picture theatre a place of restful pleasure.

NEW YORK EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE

A meeting of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Greater New York was held in their rooms, No. 136 Third avenue, at which a number of prominent speakers of civic and political bodies were present.

Mr. Trigger, in calling the meeting to order, stated that the object of this meeting was familiar to all present, and he endeavored to rehearse briefly existing conditions and the great error we are making for lack of energy. The following is a brief extract from Mr. Trigger's address:

"You have great possibilities before you for the upbuilding and uplifting of a commercial and educational business. You are all aware of this fact and know that Cinematography will go on developing and improving and growing; attaining such perfection that all intelligent audiences will approve and not condemn the motion picture theatres as heretofore. We need laws—and you are the ones to help attain these laws, but you are bad boosters. How many of you have asked your Senator or Assemblymen to visit your theatres and told him your needs? How many have asked your respective Aldermen to give you better ordinances? How many of you can say that the World has not stated facts? And still we all condemn the writer of these articles as a person trying to hurt our business and yet we must, sorry to state, admit that he has told some truths.

"As far as the children and their admission to theatres are concerned, you will find, as we all know, little boys selling newspapers, going from saloon to saloon, and no word of protest from the press. Yet the atmosphere of these saloons is naturally much worse than that of the motion picture theatres. Another cry out of which they have made capital was that quite a number of the saloons surround moving picture theatres. Where are we to go? We are not allowed to build near a church or school, and now a cry goes up that we must not build near a saloon. Should this come into effect all moving picture theatres must be built in line with the subway or overhead.

"But aside from all this nonsense, something must be done, and every man in the motion picture business must co-operate, whether a member or not; he must help individually, or join this body and attain what we desire as an organization."

At the conclusion of his speech, Mr. Trigger called upon Mrs. H. Chester Arthur, President of the Mothers' Protective League, who spoke at some length on the benefits accruing from motion pictures to all and especially to children. She stated that no person was more competent to judge the wants of children than their own mother, and as she was the mother of twelve children she considered herself a competent judge. She also mentioned the censoring of pictures and thought it unfair for any newspaper to blame the exhibitor in a matter where he was entirely guiltless, as the pictures that are run or shown on the screen in small places are shown in all the large theatres, only at an earlier date. In speaking of the environment of which so much had been said, she remarked that as these theatres could not be built near churches, hospitals or schools, it naturally befell that some of them must be near saloons; but why blame the exhibitor for that, when in ninety per cent of the cases where saloons do exist families with children reside above said saloons. She stated that she was willing to go to Albany and endeavor to do her utmost to help amend the children law.

Many representatives from numerous papers and publicity men were present and made various remarks on the growth and achievements of the motion picture industry.

Mr. Jacobs, of the Society for the Prevention of Tuberculosis, spoke on the amount of good accomplished by the motion picture theatres through the medium of the screen, etc.

Mr. Sidney Ascher, as chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, reported that at a meeting of that committee they had appealed to manufacturers of films to protect the exhibitor from further attacks and that he thought that the manufacturer should help the exhibitor financially to create a fund for the purpose of combating all scurrilous attacks made by newspapers on the motion picture industry and exhibitors. He also stated that the majority of the manufacturers willingly acquiesced to this request and funds for that purpose were being raised. A number of the exhibitors then spoke on the Folk ordinance and committees were then appointed to visit each aldermanic district in which the alderman was not in accord with the above ordinance.

The meeting, which was the most successful ever held by the above organization, adjourned at 3 p. m. to meet on Tuesday, the 17th inst.

MEETING OF THE MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS OF ROCHESTER LOCAL No. 5

Held in the Cox Building, November 22, 1912

Meeting called to order by President Wolff at 2:30 p. m., there being twenty-five exhibitors present.

There were present at this meeting our National President, Mr. M. A. Neff, and our State President, Mr. Samuel H. Trigger, both of whom were accorded an enthusiastic reception.

President Wolff introduced Mr. Trigger, who spoke to the meeting regarding the possibilities of the local organization when thoroughly organized. He pointed to Syracuse, our neighboring town, as a splendid example of what organization will do. There, out of a total of forty-nine exhibitors, forty-eight are members of the local. From expensive vaudeville and seven or eight reels they have reduced to a maximum of four reels and no vaudeville, with an increase in business. There, as in nearly every other city in the country, they are open on Sundays and do a very large business. Simply the result of organization. Mr. Trigger urged the local here to get under way and perfect the organization as soon as possible. "For then, and not until then, will you realize your power," he said.

National President Neff briefly reviewed the history of the motion picture profession, and said he would not attempt to predict the possibilities of the business. The business is in its infancy. It will soon be the greatest educational medium in existence. History, geography, science, etc., will before long be taught through the means of the motion picture. Through the moving picture the country boy can see the city and the city boy the country, without going a half a mile from home.

Mr. Neff also called attention to the great danger of overdoing the business—that the novice, before entering the field, should take advice from the veteran, because a fortune does not await all who take it up.

Mr. Neff notified the members of a World's Exhibit to be held in Grand Central Palace this coming summer from June 7th to 13th. The enthusiasm which has already been shown by promoters and exhibitors assures a splendid success.

Following Mr. Neff's talk both he and Mr. Trigger were asked several questions regarding items of interest to all. Mr. Trigger explained that the State League Law requires that each member be an owner or stockholder in a theatre and that the only way present owners could have their managers become members would be by having them hold one or more shares of stock. He also explained that if one person represented two or more theatres he would have to pay but one membership fee, but would have to pay dues for each theatre represented. Regarding theatres outside of Rochester in smaller towns where conditions are much different, the city rules and regulations adopted by the local would not be binding there.

Mr. Trigger stated that a singer must perform from a platform or floor, that as soon as the singer goes on the stage to sing that he or she is classed as a vaudeville performer.

A motion made by Mr. Esterheld and seconded by Mr. Hubbard that the local extend a vote of thanks and appreciation to Mr. Neff and Mr. Trigger for their kindness in favoring the local with their presence was unanimously carried.

A motion for adjournment was carried.

NEW YORK FILM CO.'S PRODUCTION OF "THE MIRACLE" OPENS IN NEW HAVEN, CONN.

On December 16th, at the Hyperion Theatre, New Haven, Conn., a grand opening presentation of "The Miracle," as produced by the Kunst Film Company, of Berlin, Germany, and which splendid production is being handled in America by the New York Film Company, will be given, accompanied by a lecture and specially prepared music, which will be interpreted by a full orchestra.

Later the production will also be presented in Cleveland, at the Alhambra Theatre, in the same dignified manner, and on December 30th at Baltimore.

No greater compliment could be paid the theme of "The Miracle" than that a similar production of the same thing has been the first moving picture production to invade the famous centre of music and art in London, namely, Covent Garden. A clipping from a recent issue of the New York American mentions the remarkable occurrence in the following manner:

"The 'movies' have invaded that sedate institution and stronghold of classic music, the Covent Garden Theatre.

"This famous house has been leased for the production of the Cinematograph version of Reinhardt's wordless spectacle, 'The Miracle.'

"It is true that the fashionable opera season does not begin until May, but the idea obtains among the conservative patrons of the house that the new departure comes shiveringly near being a desecration."

To those who have been fortunate enough to witness a presentation of the N. Y. Film Company's production of this famous play it is not alone a revelation of finished photography and dramatic action, but is as well a wonderful spectacle of architectural beauty, the majority of its scenes having a background chosen from the splendid ancient architecture of Europe.

A motion was also made, seconded and carried, transferring Mr. Chapman from the Ohio Local to the Utica League.

Motion made that a vote of thanks be extended to Presidents Neff and Trigger for their kind visit to Local No. 3, and that same was thoroughly appreciated. Carried.

PARSIFAL

The Ambrosio Company of Turin, the world-famed features producers, have excelled themselves in this grand production of "Parsifal," which has been immortalized by the music of Richard Wagner and is known throughout the world as an operatic masterpiece.

The opening of the film shows us the passing of the procession of the Knights of Monsalvaat, who go to venerate the Grail, the Cup in which is kept the Holy Blood of Christ. They arrive at the temple, where the bishop appoints Amfortas as Guardian of the Grail, saying to him: "This Cup will make you invincible if you will keep pure."

The magicians Klingsor and Kundry suddenly appear and together conspire to make Amfortas sin. The next scene shows the trick of the two magicians and how successful they were in causing Amfortas to sin, which makes him unworthy of the office as Guardian of the Grail. Amfortas is punished by God by a mysterious illness and his suffering causes him to confess to the Bishop his fault. They both kneel, praying God to pardon him and appoint a worthy successor. They are rewarded by seeing a vision of Parsifal.

At that moment Parsifal is awakened by an Angel and feels that he has been appointed to a great mission, and making way to his home he tells his old mother of his vision. The next scenes show us Parsifal learning the laws of knighthood and the use of arms. Then he obtains his father's sword and arms, handed to him by his mother.

We again see the two magicians plotting to find the chosen Knight, and they, using the magic looking-glass, see a reflection of him in it and then conspire to ruin him as they had Amfortas. After disguising themselves as a knight and his lady they ride out and meet Parsifal and accompany him to King Arthur's court, where Parsifal meets the notorious Knights of the Round Table. He refuses to join in their orgies.

The Bishop of the Grail, who is in attendance at the court, is mocked by the Knights and safely rescued by Parsifal, whom the Bishop sees for the first time and recognizes him as the Knight elected by his vision. Together they leave the court and the Bishop relates to Parsifal the mystery of the Holy Grail.

Parsifal is then left alone and the magician Klingsor tries to kill him, but he is disarmed by Parsifal, who makes his way to the Temple. Again the magicians try to cause his ruin, and, taking the short path, they intercept him and direct him wrongly. They then ambush him and entice him to their castle, where they make fruitless attempts to cause him to sin, but he escapes again and makes his way to the Temple.

It is the solemn day of prayers and Amfortas, who is stricken by God, tries to re-enact the miracle, but his prayers are not answered. Parsifal's timely arrival at Monsalvaat is welcomed by the Bishop and by the Knights, who thought him lost. He takes his place as Guardian of the Holy Grail and performs the miracle, conferring the Heavenly Blessing.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

The recent appearance of the Panama Canal in Kinemacolor afforded an excellent treat to those in the National Capital who are interested in this enterprise and development of the United States. A goodly number of official as well as social Washington were in attendance at the Belasco Theatre on this occasion. To see things just as they are through the eye of the camera told a far more impressive story than all the verbal newspaper accounts that have been put before the public. The enormity of the project, the gigantic operations necessary, the care and minuteness of workmanship were all vividly portrayed. Added to this the colors as produced by this wonderful camera process and the theatre chairs might well have been a conveyance taking one through Panama and the Canal Zone itself.

By a curious coincidence, the world-famous lecturer, Burton Holmes, was giving a lecture on the same subject at another theatre the same afternoon, though at an earlier hour. Before the Kinemacolor views were completed, Mr. Holmes came into the Belasco, declaring that he had hurried from his lecture to see this most wonderful process on so interesting a subject. He was indeed the most enthusiastic one among the spectators, giving applause at exceptional animated scenes and highly commending Kinemacolor. It appears that this popularized the Panama Canal subject so much that Burton Holmes was obliged to repeat his lecture by urgent request.

A multi-reel production has become a daily offering at the Maryland, Virginia, Empress, Colonial and Garden. At least once a week a two or three-reel picture play comes to the Arcade, and many of the theatres in resident sections of the city. Features have become very popular among the exhibitors and their patrons.

* * * *

"I have discovered a moving picture house that has the finest music, really classic, and so appropriate, too," said a young student of the piano to me the other day.

"And where is that?" I inquired, though not at all surprised at her discovery.

"At the Empress," came the information with enthusiasm.

When I informed her who the musicians were and that they had appeared often in concert she was amazed. The most progressive managers of motion picture theatres realize the financial value of excellent music and Manager Notes, of the Empress, is one of them.

When I informed my student of music that she would find an organ at the Colonial, an orchestra at the Garden, piano and violin at the Virginia, excellent pianists at the Pickwick, Arcade, Royal and several other houses, she was quite surprised.

"I haven't been to many shows recently," she admitted finally, "but I thought they all played that tiresome ragtime; but now that I know where to find real music, I'm going often. I like the pictures, but the music was so often a discord to the story."

This little incident carries its own conclusion.

THE CLUE IN THE DUST
Majestic Release December 15th.

OHIO exhibitors of moving pictures are beginning a thorough test of the law governing the opening of moving picture theatres on Sunday. The exhibitors of Cincinnati, Columbus, Cleveland and Dayton are permitted to show films on Sunday. However, exhibitors of smaller cities are not so fortunate. In many of the smaller cities saloons are permitted to be open, but the greatest enemy of the saloon, the moving picture theatre, is compelled to close doors. The situation should be reversed, for beneficial effects. In an effort to test the legality of the law, the Princess Theatre, of Springfield, O., was opened the other Sunday afternoon. It had hardly been opened half an hour before policemen swooped down upon it and the proprietor was arrested, charged with common labor on Sunday. He was released on $50 bail. The audience was given checks good for another performance. In the audience were all the managers or owners of other moving picture theatres, and they decided to make this a test case.

At the Princess two religious films were being shown, the "Prince of Israel" and "Rock of Ages." Despite the character of the performance and the high-class audience that visited the theatre, the Springfield Ministerial Association called a meeting for the following Monday and passed resolutions opposing Sunday picture shows. In part the resolutions read:

> We believe that to do so will have a tendency to break down what many of the greatest statesmen and lawgivers in our land have always held to be one of the greatest safeguards of our free institutions—the Bible Sabbath. According to the only authoritative record we possess, the Sabbath was given to man for two purposes—as a day of rest and a day for worship. The opening of picture shows, theatres and all like institutions where exhibitions are given for gain would, in our estimation, have a tendency to destroy both the great purposes for which the Sabbath exists. It would be robbing the multitudes of their God-given privilege of a weekly day of rest and worship according to the dictates of their own conscience, for the enrichment of the few. They do not believe that the American people are ready to make of their national Sabbath a day for common labor and mere pleasure.

According to the above resolutions, the American people, 50,000 of them in Springfield, in the estimation of a few clergymen, are not endowed with sufficient discretionary power to follow the distates of their own consciences, but must have the clergymen furnish that conscience. The ministerial argument does not hold good. The clergymen of Springfield have six days of at least partial rest and recreation; the "American people" have but one. If the "American people" wish to visit a picture theatre before or after church on the Sabbath day and view educational, scenic and religious films, presented in a dignified way, we, for one, think they are obtaining that rest so urgently desired for them by the ministerial brethren. The "American people" are enlightened enough to follow the dictates of their own consciences. The days of the Puritan Sabbath and the Blue Laws are, happily, over. Those who see harm in Sunday picture theatres, even properly conducted, are not obliged to visit them. We think the others are wise enough to choose for themselves. We are all human, and no one, be he clergyman or layman, can dictate what is right and wrong to a fellow being.

* * * *

The contention between the exhibitors and people on one side and the police and clergymen on the other is not over in Springfield, O. Whether or not selling tickets at a motion picture show is common labor was a question that was argued in the police court there for an hour last week. The police prosecutor said it is and the attorney for the moving picture exhibitors was equally positive that selling tickets on Sunday is not common labor. The judge is expected to decide the case within a few days. Probably he will decide against the theatre owner. In our opinion, had the exhibitor sold no tickets, but collected a silver offering at the door, the prosecution would have had nothing to stand upon. It has been proven elsewhere that this method is satisfactory and that visitors are more than liberal. This action, together with the dignified character of the entertainments, would possibly have solved the problem in favor of the Springfield exhibitors. In any event, we wish them success in their campaign, which is being watched with interest throughout the Middle West.

An Indiana woman's congress has adopted resolutions urging a united effort for improving the character of moving picture shows, as some were said to have a harmful influence on the children. Commenting editorially on the congressional action, the Ohio State Journal prints the following:

> The picture shows have shown great improvement since they first started, but they are not entirely what they should be. Some pictures, as the congress says, are harmful. They impress the child with false views of life, and this is a serious matter. A child's education is in his environment more than in his books, and a picture show is as much an environment as the real thing. It has a great deal to do in making his life upward or downward—in making an empty-pated fellow or a bold, bad adventurer of him. A parent must be certain of the influence his child gets under. There is hardly a picture show but what has something good in it; but it is apt to have something bad, too. Anyhow, it is best to have a care.

As the Ohio State Journal says, it is best to have a care. This great newspaper is the staunch friend of Cinematography; its editor is a picture enthusiast, and for years he has been promoting the cause of the picture. There is no doubt but that he refers to a certain kind of "feature" film that has been released too frequently within the past few months. We are happy to state that this does not apply to the majority of the features released by feature film companies, nor does it apply to the three groups of manufacturers who are honestly striving for better pictures. However, the blood-curdling, murderous film, often containing suggestive action, is too often released in two and three reels. The pictures are accompanied by sensational banners, with startling sentences in letters a foot high. Such films and such advertising matter lowers the tone of any moving picture theatre. For the continued uplift of the entire industry, these releases must be stopped, and stopped promptly. We are hearing the mutterings of a coming storm!

Moving pictures will be used by boards of health throughout the country in a campaign to emphasize the complete registration of all births. A film entitled "The Error of Omission" is being produced under the direction of the Chicago Health Department. The display of the picture depicting the troubles and misfortunes which may befall an individual whose birth has not been recorded by the authorities is advocated by municipal authorities in nearly all Middle and Western states to moving picture exhibitors.

When we knew Herbert Corey, he was city editor of the Cincinnati Times-Star, "Brother Charlie" Taft's evening newspaper. Now Herbert is turning out some good magazine fiction in Gotham, and recently he had some nice things to say about Carl Laemmle, "The Little Corporal" of filmland. Corey writes:

Carl Laemmle must have been a mighty good clothing salesman in Oshkosh. Even now, when he is the most important figure in the moving picture business, you can see traces of that apprenticeship. He comes to meet you with hand outstretched from the waist, just as though he were walking down the center aisle of his store, and you know just where you rank on schedule K before you feel that lingering—almost pulling—pressure with which he conducts you to a seat. There is a distinct hint of nobby shirtings and pantings in the smile with which he regards you, until some matter of business is placed upon his desk. Tnen Laemmle's smile flickers off. He becomes precise and authoritative, and possessed of a passion for accuracy.

His personal fortune is loosely estimated at several million dollars. A few years ago he had three thousand dollars and his health.

Laemmle doubles the value of good judgment because he adds speed—and is not afraid to take a chance. As a raw immigrant of seventeen he was not afraid to leave New York in 1884 and go to Chicago. Then he tried farming in the Dakotas, and returned to Chicago after six weeks. He worked up to a salary of eighteen dollars a week as entry clerk in a wholesale jewelry house, and gave it up to go to Oshkosh for fifteen dollars, because he thought there was money ahead in the clothing business. Eleven years later found him manager of a clothing store at a salary of $4,000 and with $3,000 in the bank. But he was not satisfied. He was willing to work hard for his money—in Chicago he had risen at three o'clock each Sunday morning and traveled twenty miles to sell papers—but he wanted to get the money when he worked.

With a vague idea of establishing a chain of five and ten-cent stores, he visited Chicago, and one night put in a rainy hour at a moving picture theatre. Before he left he knew all the proprietor did about the business. He left for Oshkosh so early the next day that he could not get breakfast at his hotel, and resigned his position and gathered up his little capital. In two weeks he had a nickel theatre in Chicago, in six weeks he had three, in six months he was operating a film exchange, and in two years he had become a manufacturer. So far as possible, he does business by wire, and it is largely due to him that the moving picture business is a spot cash one. He has no time to fool with discounts and thirty-day cash. His clerks work in their shirt sleeves, and the visitor who wishes to see Mr. Laemmle will ultimately find him by asking questions. No office boy will impede his progress, because the boys are running themselves red-faced on errands, and the telephone girl is giving a life-like imitation of an octopus doing a juggling turn with plugs.

Laemmle is undersized, kindly in manner, direct in gaze, hurried and unflurried. His years as bookkeeper and salesman taught him the value of orderly arrangement, precise knowledge and high speed. "Above all else," said Mr. Laemmle, "I insist upon being told the exact truth. I have no time to waste in running down exaggerations and inaccuracies. Also"—and there was a hint of his German birth in his low voice—"I find that when people flatter me I am in danger of losing money."

CRYSTAL HAS NEW POSTER OF MISS WHITE

Miss Pearl White, the popular star of Crystal Films, is being featured in one of the most beautiful posters ever made. It is the first five-colored poster of an individual performer that has been made and is a credit both to Miss White and to Crystal Films. This poster can be used by exhibitors showing Crystal Films.

Miss White is without a doubt one of the most popular actresses now appearing in picture plays, and this poster of her makes a fine display in the lobby of a theatre.

CHICAGO, ILL.

The many patrons of the Standard Film Exchange Company will be delighted to learn that that bustling, up-to-the-minute film dispenser has made arrangements to hereafter get all of the feature films manufactured by the Great Northern Film Company for its clientele in the states of Illinois and Wisconsin. This will indeed be good news to the exhibitors in those states who use the Standard's output, as it gives them a chance to serve their customers with pictures fresh from the fixing bath of a first-class film factory. We all congratulate the two states named and also Mr. Joseph Hopp, the genial manager of the Standard Film Exchange.

* * * *

In our gyrations around among the playhouses, last night I stepped into the famous little Senate Theatre, on Madison near Halsted, and, as usual, found it full of delighted patrons. The room has been considerably altered since my family and I used to be regular callers at the show, and instead of the "little" five-cent theatre we knew, I gazed wonderingly down a hall 192 feet long, high ceiling, and (I could scarcely believe my eyes) with the operator's booth up in the centre, looking for all the world like a huge supporting beam.

* * * *

The urbane manager, Mr. Morris Shay, who is a son-in-law of the owner, escorted me down the long hall to the stage, to show me, he said, how absolutely flickerless were his picture displays; and they were fine and steady as a die. This house shows regularly from two to three first-run reels a night from the Laemmle Film Service, has been running for about five years, and has never had a losing week. I will describe this unusual show house more fully later, that others similarly situated, with a hall too long for the ordinary projecting machine, may be very much benefited by reading the Moving Picture News.

* * * *

On South State street, within a distance of three or four blocks, there is a chain of five first-class ten-cent theatres, the pride of the entire street, all owned by one company consisting of three gentlemen, and they spare neither time nor money to make their patrons satisfied with external and internal decorations, comfortable seats and the class of vaudeville performance given, the programs of which are changed regularly twice a week, with film changes daily. The theatres are the Gem, Premier, Lyric, Bijou Dream and Orpheum. The manager of the Lyric facetiously remarked that some time ago the key to the front door of his theatre was lost, and since that time performances have never stopped, day and night.

* * * *

The Montrose Theatre, 4453 Evanston avenue, is playing to splendid business, caused, as the manager informs me, principally through strict attention to details—front lights, cleanliness throughout, a good operator and class of films chosen for display, and, above all, uniform courtesy to patrons, young and old—all conducive to success.

* * * *

The Wilson Avenue Theatre, about a stone's throw north of that busy thoroughfare, Evanston avenue, is the classy playhouse of the Northwest Side, and judging from the long line of vehicles lining the street in the neighborhood of evenings, it is getting its share of patronage of the good citizens in that fashionable residence district. They run both first-class vaudeville and the choicest moving pictures.

* * * *

The Gelder Brothers, owners and managers of the Forum Theatre, 367-69 Garfield Boulevard, are installing a new hot-water heating plant beneath their showhouse, having thrown out their former gas-heating apparatus. This is one of the South Side's popular places of amusement which is ever on the alert for the best for its classy patrons, and nightly this notice is flashed on the screen: "The films shown in this house will not be displayed anywhere in this neighborhood." This shows that the Gelders have the proper kind of contract with the film exchanges, and are determined to deliver the freshest goods for the amusement and education of their customers.

which was originally advertised to open for business during the present week, through some hitch between contractors and workmen, cannot now be completed before the first of the year—two months yet. The owners, Messrs. Escher Bros., are very much disappointed at the trend of affairs, and entertain no very exalted opinion of contractors and workmen as a while, but realize that "kicking" in this particular instance will bring nothing, and hence are taking their crushing ill luck with philosophic fortitude worthy of the theatrical profession. The Moving Picture News, gentlemen, wishes you the best of luck when your magnificent new house finally throws open its inviting doors.

* * * *

The apologies of this department of the Moving Picture News is due and hereby given to the lady manager of the Sheridan Theatre, 4523 Evanston avenue, for not getting her name upon the editor's last visit, but it being in the midst of her very busiest hour, when to butt in would have been, to say the least, indecorous, I refrained from remaining longer. But as I promised to call again, I will do so soon, and will discuss with her both the beauties of the Moving Picture News and the picture play business in general. She has a fine patronage.

Here is what I call a fine display of consistent work and creditable executive ability. Every member of Operators' Union No. 2 is employed in Chicago and suburbs; the books have been closed, and no more applications for membership can be considered until next August 1, 1913. This is the result of indefatigable work and assiduous attention on the part of the men in office in this hustling business organization, and each individual member shares proudly in the grand achievement thus accomplished in the closing months of the eventful year, 1912. This young organization has had many internal dissensions and misunderstandings since it first organized, but the better minds got together, surrendered the old charter and number and organized the present young giant, and things are going well indeed with it just now. The minimum wage scale is $21, with one matinee, and $2 for each extra matinee. This note is written to warn the traveling operators that work will not be easy to get in Chicago, just at present, and that they had better hold to their present jobs, if they had intended to come here looking for employment.

Turning westward off one of the world's brightest business thoroughfares (State street) into Adams street, where one would expect to get a surcease from the seeming continuous glare of the millions of electric lights, I was most agreeably surprised at seeing, about midway the block, another brilliant, beautiful electric sign across the sidewalk, which flashed out the words, "Pastime Theatre." I stepped inside and, asking for the manager, was shown a young man busily employed directing a number of employees in their duties. He stopped long enough to accept my card, and, reading it, immediately extended his hand. In answer to my question he said:

"Yes, sir, I am the manager, and permit me to say I am an admirer of the Moving Picture News, and will be pleased to see you any afternoon after 1:30 o'clock. Please come around." I thankfully declined his invitation to go in and see the show, and shaking hands, promised to call again soon.

Mr. J. J. Lodge, vice-president and general manager of the George Melies Film Manufacturing Company, leaves in a day or two for New York, on a business trip. He expects to be gone about two weeks. Having read that the U. S. District Court at Philadelphia had confirmed the decision of the lower court in its findings in favor of the General Film Company and against the Melies Company, I offered my sympathy, when he at once showed his chagrin and disgust.

"Now, I will leave it to you. Doesn't it occur to you as very strange that a body of men, such as those who testified against us, who were so scrupulously careful as to have me sign every other agreement should fail to exact the same thing in the particular and pivotal instance?" he asked, bitterly. "They insisted upon every step in the agreement between them and our company being put down in black on white and signed by me as representative. Then doesn't it look at least peculiar that they would accept the most important clause in the whole transaction to be consummated verbally only? I didn't agree nor think of agreeing to what they swore that I did, and I think I am justifiably sore over the decision. Besides, in my judgment, it is clearly against the law for one party to demand the right to have power to designate to whom another party to an agreement shall or shall not sell or transfer his personal shares or stock. Well, that's exactly the point, and the only point, upon which the court's decision was based."

Mr. Lodge did not say what would be his next move in the premises, but I know him well enough to believe his fighting spirit is not entirely crushed, and I would not be surprised to learn later that the case would be re-opened.

The following is part of an advertisement which I clipped from the front page of the current monthly Bulletin of Typographical Union No. 16, of Chicago, and I present it to the readers of the Moving Picture News as one of the very best I have ever seen for loyalty, good fellowship and love among men. It explains itself. The entertainment takes place to-night in Chicago:

"Thousands of us have heard of the Tuberculosis Department at the Home. We have seen brother members return from it seemingly cured, after having bid them what we thought was the final, tearful good-bye; we have read in our monthly Journal of the deaths of others from the dreaded white plague, and have pictured, in a dreamy way, the treatment they received and the snow-white tents in which they slept, together with their social and other environments while there; but here, for the first time, and maybe the last, the membership and their friends can witness, in actual motion, a member of No. 6, of New York, in almost the last stages of the fearful destroyer of men, being taken from Brooklyn to the Home; can watch with intense interest, through every minute detail, the different treatments administered and the tender, loving solicitude evidenced in the every act of those in charge.

"It is not only the duty, but will prove a great pleasure to each one, to go and see this great moving picture film, made by the Thomas Edison Company, which sent a company of performers to and from the Home with our afflicted brother, to act, each his special part, to faithfully depict and impress upon all beholders the beauty and grandeur of everything surrounding a tubercular patient at (as Mr. Edison so aptly puts it) 'the one gleam of hope, the Union Printers' Home, Colorado Springs.'

"The officers of No. 16 have done more than their full duty in securing this exceptionally brilliant treat for us, and we would indeed be ingrates not to nobly respond, not only with our individual presences, but by taking friends with us, thus testifying our appreciation of our officers, of our famous Home, and silent thankfulness to the genius of our Edison.

"An elaborate vaudeville program has been arranged and the Social Features Committee has made extra efforts to make this the greatest get-together entertainment ever offered to the members of Chicago Typographical Union No. 16."

BRAINS VERSUS BRAWN

By VIRGINIA WEST

(Adapted from Thanhouser Release.)

IN a certain small city there is a college of some prominence. In this college, a few years ago, in the department of physics, was a professor who had passed middle life—some time back.

In the little city, not so very far from the college, dwelt a widow—college and otherwise. She had been born and raised in that same town and had had many suitors from the time she was sixteen until she reached her present thirty-six years. The suitors had ranged all the way from the freshmen, with ten dollars a month spending money, to the most important single professor in the college. She had married into the faculty, but had found herself a widow at the end of a year.

Now, the widow was passionately fond of athletics. On the football team of this particular year was a young man who at once attracted her attention. He seemed to be somewhat of a mystery, but that only added to the interest in him. No one knew from whence he came, but that was not so very unusual during the football season.

Anyway this Apollo held the attention of the widow. Her greatest happiness was to see him in his native element.

Just at this time the professor of physics was a frequent and regular caller at the house of this attractive woman. She liked him, she admired him, she even felt a real friendship for him, but when he finally asked her, in well-measured sentences, to be his wife she felt that she couldn't say yes.

The students were all fond of Professor Hogue, but they couldn't help making jokes about him and repeating the queer things he did. One day he came to meet his classes with no necktie on. Another day he forgot to change his shoes and came to the college with carpet slippers. These things, of course, the boys told and made them as bad as they could.

The widow had heard of the professor's eccentricities for many years, and she felt that as a husband he might be a little uncertain.

However, she permitted the professor's attentions, having told him her exact standing in the matter.

To be near the lady of his affections, Professor Hogue was willing to do anything or go anywhere. So when Mrs. Sinclair asked him to go with her to an athletic meet he consented. He knew that he would suffer, but the extent of his suffering, both mental and physical, was far beyond any flight of the gentleman's imagination.

He was cold, his legs were cramped, the seats were hard and the backs of them were too straight. It seemed to the poor man as though everything that could make him miserable was doing it.

Then the mental torture! He clapped because the widow did, and almost wore himself out watching her for fear he might clap in the wrong place. Then he had to try to look intelligent when he hadn't any idea what they were doing nor why they were doing it.

At last the agony was over—or at least that particular brand. But alas! as they were leaving the athletic grounds something new happened. There was a pushing in the crowd, a scream from the lady at his side, a sudden springing forward of the new member of the football team, and the widow's silver meshbag was snatched from the hand of a thief while the athlete held him by the nape of the neck.

Oh, sorry day! The professor went home dejected and miserable. All the way the widow talked of the bravery of the young man and he was compelled to acknowledge it.

For several days the professor shut himself up in his study excepting the times when he was compelled to meet his students.

Thinking deeply one evening, he came to the final conclusion that Science and not Love was his field. Well, after all, the widow had refused him, so he supposed there was nothing to do but put the whole matter out of his mind.

As he sat thus brooding before his study fire, his eyes closed and his head dropped to the back of his chair.

Then something seemed to happen in the professor's mind. The first thing he knew he was being led, a captive, into Rome—the Rome of the Cæsars. And yet, strange to say, he possessed all of his present-day knowledge.

The scene changed. He, with many other slaves, was put into quarters like those he had read about in his Latin and his Roman history. After staying there a while it was announced to him that on the morrow he was to fight in the arena.

Now, the professor knew perfectly well that he couldn't fight in the arena nor any place else, but he didn't intend to say so. He just kept quiet and worked his brains. An idea came to him and he said to the man, "Go say to Cæsar that I would speak with him. That which I would say may please him much."

The man went and soon returned to lead Professor Hogue to the presence of Cæsar.

"Most worthy Cæsar," he began, for he thought that was the way to do it. "Most worthy Cæsar, to-morrow I fight in the arena. If thou wilt I can make great sport for thee."

"Speak slave!"

"I seem spare and lacking strength. I tell thee, if Cæsar wish, to-morrow, single-handed, I will fight gladiators to the greatest number he can name."

The professor was pleased to see Cæsar give a start of astonishment. "But," he continued, "I ask one favor of great Caesar—that I may choose my weapons even as I do desire."

"'Tis granted, slave. If thou canst win I give thee back thy freedom."

The little professor, once more back in the slave's quarters, set to work. He didn't know where his materials came from, but that was of no consequence as long as they were there.

He worked constantly until the appointed time and then made his way, with his mysterious weapons, to the arena.

When he saw his opponents he stood staring, almost forgetting for the moment his means of defense. There stood before him six men who were almost giants.

Quickly the little man gathered himself together and stood ready. The giants were grinning at him, but at the same time they looked a little wonderingly at the little round balls in his hands.

They began to advance, very slowly at first, then faster and faster. The professor watched his best moment and then, with a succession of quick movements, he threw his little balls.

"Bang! Boom! Boom! Bang! Bang! Bang!"

The professor alone stood upon the floor of the arena.

"Before I grant thy freedom," said Cæsar, when he had recovered his breath and had sent for the professor, "tell to me the name of the weapons thou didst use."

"Dynamite," answered the professor.

"Dynamite," repeated Cæsar. "We must have more of it at the games. Go, slave, thou hast won thy freedom."

The professor lost no time in getting away. In fact, he went so fast that with a start he found himself back in his own twentieth century study.

"Dear me, dear me, I must have fallen asleep," said the little man. "Well, well, that was a funny dream for a man of my years and intelligence to have."

He sat rubbing his eyes for a while.

Suddenly he sat up very straight. "I have a thought!" he said aloud. "I believe it is a very good thought, too. Let me see. It must be stated exactly and comprehensively. Let me see now—'One may need Science in love as well as in other things.' scientific management of the heart, as it were. Well, well."

So the professor sat before his study-fire late into the night, wondering what particular method he had better use in his own affair. At last he sighed and arose to retire. He had not found it but he hoped to at another time. He would give his mind time enough to work it out scientifically.

The next day, as the professor was walking slowly past the widow's house, with his chin low, he suddenly heard a voice calling him. He stopped and turned toward the house of the widow, for he knew it was her voice.

"Oh, my friend, do come in and tell me what to do. I am in terrible trouble," she cried.

"Indeed I shall," and the professor was at her side, ready to do any heroic act that needed brains.

"Just look at this," said the widow excitedly. "It is a black hand letter demanding $10,000 from me. What shall I do?"

Before the professor had time to answer, another voice said, "What is it, my dear Mrs. Sinclair? I am at your service."

They both turned to find the young athlete coming up the walk.

When he had seen the letter he laughed. "Why, I'll capture the criminal easily," he said.

The professor looked at him out of the corner of his scientific eye. "I think I may be of some service to you, Mrs. Sinclair," he said quietly.

"I thank you both so much," said the widow tearfully.

When the night arrived upon which the money was to be delivered, the professor was sitting quietly in his study. If you could have looked closely at him, however, you would have found that the first finger of his right hand rested upon a button and that his eyes were upon the clock before him.

Tick, tick, tick, tick. The long hand moved slowly to ten minutes past twelve, midnight.

"That will do," said the professor, and pushed long and steadily on the white button. Then, quickly taking his hat, he left the room.

"Well, well! I've caught the whole lot of them," chuckled the little man when he arrived upon the scene.

There, in an ingeniously contrived trap, were two policeman and the athlete.

"Let me out of here," cried the latter in a rage.

The professor looked at the policemen with much meaning. "Since there is no one else to search it might not be a bad plan to search your fellow-prisoner, officer."

The search was made. A copy of the black hand letter and several other incriminating documents were found upon him.

"Well," said the professor the next day after reading a note from the widow, "if I am a scientist, I must acknowledge there is something in dreams."

A NEW DEVELOPING RACK

In the past twenty years, that is to say, since the art began, there has been but one patent taken out on apparatus to be used in developing motion picture films, and that was taken out last week. Just why this important branch of the business has been neglected is not easily explained. But from the very beginning there has been the same old drums, the same rectangular frames and the same pin-racks, each having its advocates and each having some advantage over the other in minor features. Perhaps the most popular in this country is the rectangular frame, though some operators prefer the pin-rack, in spite of the fact that putting the film on the pins is a slow and tedious operation. The rectangular frame, on the other hand, requires a large tank and therefore a very large quantity of developing solution. In the haste to get out the work on time, perhaps this solution is not made up fresh as often as would bring out the best photographic quality of negative. For this reason, some operators insist on the pin-rack, though it is slower than the rectangular frame to put the film on, especially in the dark-room.

This led to the invention of the loose-pin-rack illustrated in the accompanying cuts. The pins normally lie down along the length of the crossarms, with the exception of the inner pin of each arm, which stands up about half way. Upon one of these pins the looped end of the film is slipped. Then, with the roll of film held in one hand, the rack is rapidly rotated by the other hand. This causes the film to lie against the semi-reclining pins, each of which thereupon instantly comes up into a vertical position. The short extension at the bottom of the pin sets up the next pin half way, each in succession throughout the entire series, the film catching thereon in turn, until the whole of the film is wound on.

It will be observed, therefore, that it is impossible for the film to miss a single pin, or for more than one convolution of film to go on the same pin. The result is that the rack can be turned just as fast as may be desired. One hundred feet of film can be laid on these pins in ten or twelve seconds, and two hundred feet in somewhat less than twice as long.

In taking off the wet film, after development, the end of the film is attached to the drying reel and the motor started. By hand the film is guided onto the rotating drying reel, and no attention is required by the developing rack, for the pins released from the film lie down instantly, by reason of their shape and by centrifugal force of the rapidly rotating rack, and the film comes off without being marred in the least.

The use of the new pin-racks permits fresh solution with every negative developed, which, obviously, insures the very best photographic quality in the resultant negative.

The racks are also particularly desirable in the tinting of films, for but a small quantity of each solution is required, and therefore a great many colors can be assembled in a limited space.

NEW SPECIAL FEATURE FILM EXCHANGE OPENS IN NEW YORK

A new exchange, doing business under the name of Star Special Feature Film Exchange, has recently opened at 20 East Fourteenth street, New York, with Joseph F. Coufal as general manager.

This concern has already secured the exclusive rights for Greater New York, and New York State, for the unnamed Itala feature in three reels which was received in our last issue, and which is one of the finest features that has yet appeared on the market. They have also secured State rights for all New York and New Jersey for the Eclair two-reel feature "In the Land of Darkness" and for the three-reel Eclair "The Queen of the Camarague."

GREAT NORTHERN SPECIAL FEATURE

The Great Northern Special Feature Film Company is priding itself upon the demand which is being made for its latest sensational feature, entitled "The Great Ocean Disaster, or Fire at Sea." State rights are being disposed of so rapidly that but few territories still remain, and in the meantime the popularity of "Dr Gar El Hama" has caused it to be sold in almost every state in the union. The company urges prompt action in making application for the territory still remaining.

The American Film Company have added to their stock company several well-known moving picture stars, namely, W. Wallace Reid, son of Hal Reid, the illustrious novelist, and formerly connected with the Vitagraph, Reliance and Imp studios; Lillian Christy, also a lead from the Vitagraph ranks, and Chet Whitey, a character man, who counts his greatest success the playing of the character heavy of Runnion in Rex Beach's "The Barrier."

"THE BRIDGE OF SORROW"

(Gaumont States Rights)

The Gaumont two-reel production, for release about January 1, is indeed very interesting. The theme in the first place is tremendously sensational, and in the second place it has been produced with the top-notch perfection which attends the production of the majority of Gaumont releases. The story is one of stock manipulation—another question of money vs. human life. The president of the Pyrenees Railroad Company, as the St. Lawrence bridge nears completion, forms a new corporation for the purpose of disposing more advantageously of the railroad stocks. The bridge is completed, the stocks are boosted up, and things look generally rosy, when a telegram arrives telling of flaws that have been found in the great bridge structure. Mrs. Bardon, wife of the railroad president, keeps a close eye on the affairs of her husband, and is horrified when he persists in completing the sale of stock before ordering the traffic across the bridge stopped, and denounces him bitterly.

When the last 60,000 shares are disposed of at $5 a share. he finally consents to allow the order to be sent forth stopping all traffic at the bridge. The train dispatcher, however, receives the message just one minute too late and the train is seen disappearing around the curve, departing from the station just as the dispatch reaches the operator. The next scene is a terrible thrill, when the train crashes through the imperfect structure into the awful abyss below.

Splendid dramatic action accompanies the interpretation of this story. The scene in the head office of the railroad company, where the friends and relatives of victims await the sad news, is most effective. The responsible man is taken to prison. In a year's time, when he is pardoned, he finds his wife, with her little child, in humble surroundings, after she has spent their fortune in trying to help the needy that the accident has created. The eternal bond of love, however, again brings husband and wife together, and the sad lesson makes one better man in the world.

THE WOMAN BEHIND THE MAN

(Solax)

Mr. Spendthrift.....Darwin Karr
Mrs. Spendthrift.....Sallie Crute
Mr. Frugal.....Fraunie Fraunholz
Mrs. Frugal.....Blanche Cornwall
Society ladies and others.

Women have changed the map of Europe, women have wrecked careers, and women have been man's incentive, his motive to success. The success or failure of man depends on the woman who is behind him. The moral of this story shows what misery a woman can cause a man if she does not live within his income; on the other hand, there is a parallel case, showing the antithesis, how happy and successful a man will be if his wife understands him, encourages him and makes his home warm and comfortable, so that when he goes to business he works energetically and effectively, because he has no bad home influence to distract his attention from his work.

The story covers a period of ten years. In this time, while Mr. and Mrs. Spendthrift have been going down, Mr. and Mrs. Frugal have been going up on the "ladder of success." The end finds the Spendthrifts separated. Mr. Spendthrift is thrown out of a saloon, a wreck and a bum. Mrs. Spendthrift is seen in a hall bedroom, seeing a vision of her former self. She is determined to get fine clothes, and leaves her hall bedroom and takes the road open to a poor woman who has extravagant ideas. Mr. and Mrs. Frugal have pushed forward, have a happy home, and prosper.

A POLICY OF EXPANSION

The Motiograph Opens Eastern Offices for Repair Facilities

We are advised by the makers of the Motiograph motion picture machine of the recent opening of an Eastern as well as Western office for the purpose of extending better repair facilities to the far away users of their well-known machine.

The Enterprise Optical Mfg. Co., whose main office and factory has for the past five years been located at 564-572 West Randolph street, Chicago, is a pioneer in the motion picture machine industry, having been a full going concern more than fourteen years ago. It has been apparent during all of that time that the advanced ideas in machine construction of their machine would not only place them in the lead but keep them there.

When, five years ago, this company made a five-year lease on their present factory consisting of almost thirty thousand square feet of floor space, it was very freely predicted that the only thing to be expected was failure.

A reference to the advertisement of this company in this issue will inform you as to the location of their Eastern and Western offices and will convince the most skeptical of the wonderful growth, in a few years, of an industry which, as recently as five years ago, was looked upon as a joke.

The Enterprise Optical Mfg. Co. carries a pay-roll averaging more than one hundred employees throughout the year. They have a force of six demonstrators now on the road and two special inspectors in Chicago alone. Their office is commodious and handsomely furnished throughout in quartered oak, and their building is of steel and concrete construction equipped only with the most modern electrically driven machinery.

CARL HOLLIDAY, DIRECTOR OF EDUCATIONAL DEPARTMENT OF THE GAUMONT CO.

That men of higher education are finding a field for their culture in the motion-picture industry is evidenced by the engagement by the Gaumont Company of Carl Holliday, B.S., M.A. He now fills the newly created office of director of its educational department. This department will do business with schools, elementary and advanced, churches, etc. The subjects included will be applied science, botany, geography (both physical and industrial), zoölogy, history, the industrial world, travel, architecture, agriculture, horticulture and Biblical and other religious subjects.

Mr. Holliday, who is a brother of Frank E. Holliday, managing editor of the Gaumont Weekly, is well equipped intellectually for his duties. "Who's Who" for 1912 tells of his having studied at the universities of Tennessee, Virginia and Chicago, of his professorship of the English language and English literature in the University of Virginia, Southwestern University and Vanderbilt University. He is the author of ten books on literary, historical and sociological subjects. McClure's, Leslie's, Smart Set, Uncle Remus, American Educational Review, the Book News Monthly and numerous other magazines and newspapers have published his many writings.

SPECIAL EVENT ON THE JOB AGAIN

Mr. Beck, manager of the Special Event Film Company, leaves on Wednesday, December 4th, for an extended trip through the West to take local pictures of several towns in the States of Texas and Arizona. His main object in going West is to complete the educational pictures he had been working on for the past three or four years.

Mr. Beck will be gone for several weeks, and after his return from the West he will make a trip across "the pond" to get a general idea of what is doing in the European market.

Mr. Beck has several new pictures, and, in a few months, when ready for release, he will most likely open up with a "spurt."

JOE'S REWARD
Reliance Release December 11th.

STATEMENT FROM PRESIDENT GOLDBLATT

Local No. 35 of the I. A. T. S. E. has conceded to its branch known as the M. P. O. Branch No. 2 the right to elect their own officers. The reason for so kind a deed Local 35 claims is that the members of the so-called Branch No. 2 have at last learned to conduct their meetings in an orderly manner. But a good many of the readers of this valuable magazine who are acquainted with the present situation of the New York operators no doubt know the true reason for such a kind act.

For the benefit of those that do not know the true cause of the generosity on the part of Local No. 35, I shall try to make it very explicit.

Several of the members of the Branch No. 2 claim the credit for this wonderful victory. Also Local No. 35, in other words, Branch No. 1, comes along with much assurance and says that we, No. 35, are responsible for this noble act by giving the Branch No. 2 the privilege of electing their own officers; and, no doubt, many more will come forward to claim the glory for bringing about the emancipation of the moving picture operators of Greater New York. But there's no doubt, to my mind, that the intelligent operator, be he a member of Branch No. 1 or of No. 2, or of the Independent Local of Operators will tell you, as I have been told by the many different ones whom I come in contact with daily, that the credit wholly and only is due to the Independent organization, and no one knows it better than Local No. 35, and others who are equally responsible for the horrible conditions surrounding the operators of New York.

PRES. ROBERT GOLDBLATT

The above cut is the latest photo of Robert Goldblatt, who must be given credit for organizing the operators, and holding his own as he has done. He brought order out of chaos, and on my visits to the Union I was very pleased with the manner in which Brother Goldblatt presided over the boys, and the admirable manner in which they conducted their business. It certainly was a treat to be present, and the operators ought to be proud of such a president, who is ably assisted by Ralph Knaster in keeping together 500 good men and true, and in a little while I will be glad to learn that every operator in New York City is a member of Union No. 1.

A good many, no doubt, read a copy of my letter which I sent to President Gompers, of the American Federation of Labor, which was printed in the Moving Picture News in the issue of September 7th. I would advise you to get a copy and make yourself familiar with something that involves your bread and butter; in fact, you'll find it very interesting to read our column in the weekly Moving Picture News that will make you acquainted with the entire situation.

I am somewhat off the point. If you'll read the above mentioned letter, it will soon convince you where the credit is due, and I'm certain that you will all agree with me. I suppose it will rather surprise you to read that the credit which my organization so persistently claims is satisfied to give it to anyone who is particularly desirous of it. The Branch members claim that, by having their own officers, that everything will be peaceful between Branch No. 1 and Branch No. 2 thereafter, and I predict that thereafter the real trouble will commence between those two branches. That doesn't seem possible to a good many, but time will tell, unless Local No. 35 has waived the jurisdiction of the moving picture machine from their charter; that I hardly believe they did. So you can see that makes two locals of moving picture operators in one city, not counting the Independent Union.

And the same thing will happen with the present Branch of Local No. 35 as did with its former auxiliary. The excuse Local No. 35 gives for giving their Branch No. 2 the right to elect their own officers is a very poor one, and should not be believed by any sensible man. It's only one of the many ways that they have tried to suppress the Independent M. P. O. Union of Greater New York, and this last move will prove as great a failure as did the former.

The operator in New York has got to be given that which wholly belongs to him, and unless he gets that, things will be far worse in the future for Local No. 35. If Local No. 35 really means to have harmony established between all the moving picture operators of New York and in order to make the branch with its own officers a success, Local No. 35 must waive the right of the moving picture machines which they're withholding from the operators, or else the operators shall merge with Local No. 35, since Local No. 35 has the jurisdiction of the moving picture machine. If neither of the above mentioned propositions can be secured by the operator from Local No. 35, then let me again repeat my old cry, and that is one other thing left—a direct charter from the I. A. T. S. E. I don't care how many officers Branch No. 2 will get, it will not and cannot make matters better. Just as soon as Branch No. 2 will start to legislate for themselves they are going to infringe upon the charter rights of Local No. 35. And I need not tell you what will follow.

That reminds me of two years ago. At that time the Auxiliary to Local No. 35 was in existence. I remember a committee was appointed by the Auxilliary to appear before Local No. 35, to ask them if they would be so kind as to give the Auxiliary the privilege of electing their own officers, I happened to be the chairman of that committee, and when we made that request of Local No. 35, I thought that a cyclone had struck them. They said we must be crazy to ask for such impossibilities. They claimed that if they allowed us to govern our own affairs that we would naturally step on their corns (meaning the moving picture machine) which we claimed belongs to us, and they told us they are the mother local, and that we would have to do as they saw fit, and they mean to do likewise with this new branch.

And what made them change their attitude so suddenly toward the operators? If you don't know I shall be glad to tell you. It's because they are trying to wipe out the Independent Union.

Local No. 35 blames me and the other officers as well as the individual members, for creating, as they term it, a dual organization in New York. I say differently. Local No. 35 are the ones to get the credit for it, and they are also responsible for the wonderful progress that it is making, and unless Local No. 35 gives to us that which they know belongs to us, so long will they keep this so-called dual organization in existence.

ROBERT GOLDBLATT,
President.

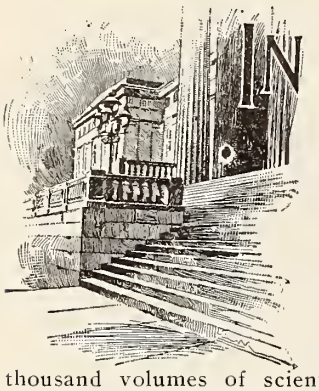
INNOVATIVE

Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Especially for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City



In the Patent Office, the division of classification has been rehabilitated and reorganized, and as a consequence, great and substantial results are being attained. The work progresses slowly, due to the fact that there must be digested not only the great volume of American patents already issued, amounting now to over a million, but also between two and three millions of foreign patents, and about fifty thousand volumes of scientific and technical works in the Patent Office library. When this work is completed, an enormous benefit will accrue to the inventors and manufacturers of this country and the public generally, since the work of examination of applications for patent will be much simplified, and such patents as are granted will have a much greater degree of validity attached to them.

Furthermore, applications of trade-marks are now on the same footing as applications for patent, in that responsive answer to any official action must be made within the year limit. Formerly it was necessary for the examiners of trade-marks to search through 20,000 pending applications, in various stages of prosecution. The new rule will expedite registration.

The Eastman Kodak Company of Rochester, N. Y., has applied for the registration of "ZELTA" as a trade-mark for photographic paper, claiming use since September 20, 1912.

New Jersey has from time immemorial been considered "foreign" in many respects, and now it develops (that is, the film does) that its natural scenery is cosmoramic, particularly portions of the Hudson Palisades and parts adjacent to Coytesville. Africa, Transvaal, Ireland, Germany, Mexico, and various other climes and countries have scenic representatives accredited thereto; and the ground is also historic as well as histrionic, many battles, both native and foreign, ancient and modern, having been fought there recently, not to mention other startling phantasmal stunts.

We read that approximately two hundred and fifty million feet of film was marketed in America last year, good, bad and indifferent. A little less attention to quantity and more to quality would be appreciated by the average movie fan.

Recently we noted the appointment of Redford as English censor of films and prognosticated trouble, which is verified. His propensity to "cut it out" is viewed with some apprehension, not only in America, but by continental and colonial film makers also. The first on the list of banned films are those dealing with Biblical subjects, while the second are those relating to crimes, which latter restriction is sensible enough. Prize fights, dog fights and "mixed bathing" are lumped together in the list, and since the "fights" are no longer popular, the main sufferers will be the Australian government emigration authorities, who are fond of illustrating the salubrity of the antipodean climate by exhibiting films of Australian beaches. This edict against "mixed bathing" scenes is inconsistent in a country which permits its bathers to appear in beach costumes which would cause the immediate arrest of the wearers in any of these United States.

Patent No. 1,045,138, to Frederick W. Goller, agent, and John S. Patterson, theatrical carpenter, of London, England, and assigned to Lalla Mary Pantzer, professionally known as Lalla Selbini, of Streatham Hall, England, relates to theatrical devices of the kind originated by the late "The Great Lafayette," wherein a cage intended to contain a living lion, tiger, or other man-eating animal is used, said cage being so constructed and operated as to produce the effect of apparently feeding a person to said wild animal. The object of the present invention is to so construct the apparatus as to render it impossible for the animal to have access to the actors at any time during the working of the illusion. The wild animal is confined in a safe inner cage, movable within the outer cage, so as to be brought up to the front bars of the latter for exhibition purposes. Before the "feeding" illusion is enacted, this inner safe cage is retracted and hidden by shutters, and the human food is precipitated into the outer cage as is also an actor made up to represent the wild animal. The illusion (?) terminates with the front of the outer cage opening apparently automatically and the actor and actress (of course the food must be tender) walking out down stage, after which the front of the outer cage closes, and the inner safe cage is again moved to the front.

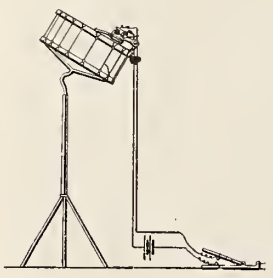
The claims are for an outer cage or shell, a rail track on the floor of said shell, a closed animal's cage located within said shell and provided with wheels to engage said rail track, means for moving said animal's cage over said track, and for various minor details in the construction and arrangement of parts.



Patent No. 1,045,357, issued to Fred O. Anderson, of Hamlin, Ia., is for certain improvements in means for operating snare drums, which ought to be appreciated by the general utility member in the ordinary condensed orchestra allotted to moving picture shows. The object of the invention is to produce a snare drum "player" that may be manually (pedal) controlled to produce any desired number of staccato taps. A further object is to provide an electrically actuated device having an adjustable clamp whereby the device may be attached to various types of drums. Besides the aforesaid adjustable clamp, the patent claims a drum player comprising an electrically controlled vibratory drum-tapping device and a circuit-closer for said tapping device, including a base-plate having an upstanding heel stop, a treadle hinged to said base-plate in advance of said stop, a spring interposed between said treadle and said base-plate serving to hold said treadle in raised position, and contact points in circuit with said tapping device and disposed on said base-plate and said treadle, and adapted to contact upon depression of said treadle against the tension of said spring.

Patent No. 1,045,149, to Boleslaw Januszewski, of Revere, Mass, relates to certain improvements in devices for opening the shutters of cameras automatically after a predetermined time, so that the operator may, for example, be given time to place himself within the range of the camera, after the camera is set and before the shutter is opened. The invention is designed to provide a simple device which is adapted to be readily attached to an ordinary camera, and which, with certain modifications may be made to operate any one of the common devices for controlling camera shutters. The accompanying view shows the device as especially adapted to operate the usual shutter-operating thumb lever, although it may be readily adapted for use to operate other forms of shutter-controlling devices. The mechanism of the device comprises a time-operating mechanism which is similar to an ordinary clock movement, and an actuating mechanism which is adapted to actuate the shutter-operating mechanism when released by the time-operating mechanism, together with certain details of construction set forth specifically in a long description and eight claims

THE lack of sensitiveness in autochrome plates has long been a serious obstacle to the instantaneous work desirable in outdoor as well as portrait color-photography. Important improvements in this respect have recently been attained in Lyons, France, the home of the art, the problem having been solved first by substituting for natural light an artificial light strong enough to reduce the time of exposure to a fraction of a second, and again, by hypersensitizing the plate through the use of certain coloring agents of the cyanide group. Flash-lights have been employed, derived from a so-called perchlora powder, which is a mixture of two parts magnesium and one part of perchlorate of potash. The method of overcoming the lack of sensitiveness consists in hypersensitizing the plates by impregnation with cyanide coloring agents known as pinachrome, pinacynaol and pinaverdol. This treatment reduces to about one-fourth the time requisite for exposure.

Registration has been granted the Societe Francaise des Films et Cinematographs Eclair, of New York City, for the trade-mark "Universal" as applied to moving picture films. Used since July 1, 1912.

We shall be pleased to answer pertinent questions propounded by readers of the Moving Picture News.

MUSICAL SUGGESTION FOR "THE VENGEANCE OF THE FAKIR"

Eclair Release

By WALTER C. SIMON

Play "Vision of Salome" (Remick) until title appears—(Title) "Captain Sneade of the British Army and the Fakir." Then play "The British Grenadiers" until soldier hits "Fakir"; then play "Vision of Salome" until title appears—(Title) "The Hour of Prayer." Then play "Egyptian March" (by Strauss, leaving out the E major strain) until the following title appears—(Title) "Captain Sneade's Baby," then play "Lullaby" (from "Erminie") until next title appears—(Title) "The Happy Hour of the Day." Then play "Love's Old Sweet Song" until change of scene (Bedroom), then play "A Misterioso" until change of scene (Parlor). Then play a "hurry" until title appears — (Title) "The Instrument of Vengeance." Play a "hurry" and about every two measures play a chromatic run starting from G on the second line down to A, sustaining the loud pedal and play as fast as possible. This will, if correctly played, imitate the tiger's roar. Play the "hurry" and chromatic run this way only whenever tiger is seen, otherwise just play the "hurry." THE NIGHT BEFORE CHRISTMAS (Dec. 17).—The Christmas season is approaching and Mrs. Corbin, who has been a sufferer from the past Christmas and wonders what the outcome of the coming Christmas will be if the operation which she is contemplating should be fatal to her. John Corbin dearly loves his family and works hard to give them every comfort within his means. He is very anxious about his wife's operation. He has promised that it shall be done. He is surprised to learn that it will cost $500.00. One day, when a client leaves $500.00 in his charge to be invested in stocks, he is interrupted by the telephone bell and instead of placing the money in the safe, he unconsciously places it in his pocket. Answering the telephone, he receives a message from his little daughter Helen, saying her mother is very sick. John hurries home and decides that the operation must be performed at once. At that moment he thinks of the money in his pocket, decides to use it and replace it later.

Mrs. Corbin undergoes the operation and dies. Her husband's theft is discovered and he is sent to jail. His motherless child is left with Mrs. Corbin's sister, Ruth, and Christmas is destined to be a sad and lonely one for her. Corbin works in the prison shoeshop. He cuts from the spare pieces of leather little dolls, which he hopes to send his daughter at Christmas time.

The night before Christmas he manages to escape. He is swift of foot and leaves the guards far behind. He makes haste for his home, where he tells his sister-in-law that he has come to play Santa Claus for his little Helen. Hastily taking the Santa Claus suit from the cupboard, he dresses himself in the disguise, goes into his child's bedroom and tells her that Santa Claus has come to wish her a Merry Christmas and present her with some leather dolls. The little one is happy to meet old Santa. Leaving the bedroom and entering the living room, he finds the prison guards awaiting him. Removing his costume, he goes with them back to prison. The next day, Christmas, is made brighter for Corbin by the thoughts of having made his child happier.

POWERS

A MAN (Dec. 20).—Glen Hardin is convicted of murder, of which he is innocent. Smarting over the injustice of it he contrives to escape from prison, where he is serving sentence, eludes the officers, and takes to the mountains, where he discovers a deserted cabin and takes undisputed possession. His retreat is an isolated portion of the country and he is secure in his hiding. Sue, the daughter of a mountaineer, rides far afield one day and meets Hardin at a spring where he has come for water. She instinctively loves the taciturn man, for he is not like her kind, a revelation to the girl. As his movements are mysterious her interest is excited. He shows the direction of her home and she goes. Once at home her father urges her to marry Luke, a typical ne'er-do-well of the mountain section, and she rebels. She rides again to escape the taunts of her father and is found by Luke, who pulls her from her horse and attempts to kiss her. He is observed by Hardin, who administers a deserved thrashing to Luke. The girl rides away and Luke stalks Hardin and shoots him. The girl hears the shot, finds Hardin, and assists him to his cabin, where she ministers to his wound. Returning home she finds that her father has returned from the settlement, bringing some newspapers. She reads in one that the man who committed the crime of which Hardin was convicted has confessed and Hardin is innocent. She does not know the name of the recluse on the mountain, but intuitively divines that it is Hardin, the man mentioned. Taking the paper she rides to his cabin and, finding him gone, leaves the newspaper in a conspicuous place. He returns, finds the newspaper account and is overjoyed. He is vindicated, a free man, and his thoughts turn to the wild rose of the mountains. He goes to her and she does not repulse him. He takes her from her home in the wilds, back to civilization, his world, and they are married.

IMP

THE LONG STRIKE (Dec. 16).—Jim Starkey is betrothed to Jane Learoyd, the daughter of old Noah Learoyd. Both men work in the factory of Richard Readley, who makes advances to Jane. To free herself of his attentions she arranges to meet the employer of her father and sweetheart near her house at night.

Her father learns of the appointment and, loading an old-fashioned pistol, for which he uses as a wad a portion of a letter written to his daughter by her sweetheart, Jim. He then starts out for the place of the appointment and, seeing his daughter in the arms of his employer, believes that she is dishonored, and shoots him. At that instant he loses his mind.

His daughter Jane knows that he has done this, but her sweetheart Jim is accused. The wad is found near the body and the fact that it is in his handwriting is used as evidence against him.

At the moment of the murder, however, he was in another city saying farewell to his pal, Johnny Reilly, who is leaving for Europe on an Atlantic liner.

When Jim returns to his home he is arraigned and accused. Jane comes to his cell and he tells her of the meeting with Johnny, the sailor on the steamship Columbia, and she, to save his life, calls on a prominent attorney, asking him to help her. It is her race for her sweetheart's life which gives a tremendous thrill to the story. We see her pleading with the cranky lawyer, who eventually decides to help her. We see her arrive at the steamship dock, but too late. The old lawyer hires a tug and they race after the huge liner. Eventually they catch up with it and, stopping it, Jane and the lawyer climb aboard. The captain, however, refuses to allow Johnny to return to New York, claiming that he needs him for his crew, which is short-handed.

Johnny pleads with him, but in vain, and Jane and the lawyer sorrowfully return to the tug, which pulls away from the vessel. Johnny realizes that his friend's life is in his hands. He makes one more appeal to the captain, is refused, ordered to be put in irons for insolence, and this is about to be done when he runs to the side of the vessel and makes a magnificent dive into the sea, one hundred feet below. He is picked up by the tug, which races back to New York. They arrive there too late to catch the train, but bargain with an engine driver to take them back to where Jim is being tried. This is done and they arrive in the court room just as the jury returns and is about to pronounce the verdict of guilty. Johnny rushes up to the stand, gives his evidence and, by order of the Judge, Jim is released.

NESTOR

COPS AND COWBOYS (Dec. 16).—Jack and Bob are a couple of young rips. Jack goes West to visit Uncle John, the mayor of Maverick. He looks for diversion and trouble. Jack discovers that the sheriff is kept busy with ordinary unsober gentlemen and extraordinary collisions and things. Jack persuades his uncle to create two policemen and wires Bob to hurry along and bring two nice, nobby policemen uniforms with him. Bob hurries along, scenting novelty, and the two are quickly on the job and create a tremendous impression, not altogether unmixed with sneers and derision from the inhabitants.

They meet with various adventures and eventually get their chance when Peevish Pete horrows a roll of bills at gun point and rides off to his lonely shack, to figure out how he will spend it. The sheriff and posse go after him, but Pete insists upon arguing with his gun and they return to devise a new plan to show him how extremely wrong is his behavior. Jack and Bob ride out accompanied by a sack of sulphur. Jack ascends to the roof and empties the sulphur down the chimney. It connects with the fire and Peevish Pete is literally smoked out. The boys are outside the door waiting for him and they secure him and lead him back in triumph. They are acclaimed as heroes and are amply rewarded by two lovely girls, who present the boys with their hands and futures in return for two little loops of gold.

CHAMPION

RIGHT SHALL PREVAIL (Dec. 16).—Bob and George Morton go to the theatre where the famous dancer, Irene, is performing. Both men become infatuated with the dancer and when the manager of the theatre offers to introduce them to her they gladly welcome the opportunity and the manager and the brothers visit Irene in her dressing room and an introduction is affected, and after the theatre a supper is suggested and agreed upon. While at the restaurant George, who has little respect for women of the stage, offers an insult to the girl, which she resents. Bob acts as the girl's champion and upbraids his brother for his action. Bob escorts Irene home after leaving his brother and the manager in the restaurant. On his return home Bob is provoked into a quarrel by his brother, which is stopped by their father. In the course of a few weeks Bob and Irene learn of their love for each other, and decide to get married. Bob informs his father of his intention to marry the dancer. His father objects to the marriage, being influenced by George and Bob's eldest sister. George maliciously casts reflections on Irene's character, which causes Bob to flare up in Irene's defense, the result being that Bob leaves his father's house, declaring that he shall never return until they welcome Irene as his wife. After several years George, who is the victim of a drug habit, is cautioned by the doctor to abstain from it. George ignores the doctor's advice and allows himself to let the drug get the best of him. The father learns that George is leading a disreputable life, but does not realize that he is a victim of a drug habit. He begins to realize that he has allowed the best boy to go away and regrets he had listened to his daughter's and son's advice. Bob, after his marriage, had experienced great misfortune, one being that Irene was taken sick and compelled to leave the stage. Bob does the best he can to support her, and one day, while returning home from work, chances to meet his father, who explains to the boy that he has altered his opinion and, after learning that Bob's wife is sick, requests Bob to take him to see her. This visit proves to be the means of uniting father and son. The old gentleman is taken with his daughter-in-law, whom he has never seen before. He returns home and when he explains that he intends to bring Bob and his wife into the family, he receives opposition from his daughter and George, but he promptly tells them that nothing they can say will alter his opinion. Mr. Morton gives a reception in honor of his son and daughter-in-law. The sister changes her attitude toward Irene and welcomes her into the household, but George still retains his same opinion and, on the evening of the reception, while under the influence of the drug, becomes obnoxious and offers a great insult to Irene. Bob for the second time defends his wife against his brother, who, being aroused to hatred toward his brother and wife, concocts a scheme to bring disgrace on them both. He enters his sister's room, takes her jewels and places them in Irene's cloak. Later the jewels are found in Irene's possession, who, being accused of theft, breaks down. The girl, unable to bear the accusation, loses all control of herself and runs wildly from the house. Her absence is discovered and Bob goes in search of her and finds her exhausted, after she has traveled several miles into the country, her evening gown torn to shreds. George realizes how dastardly he has been and seeks to drown his conscience in the drug, which proves too much for his weakened heart and he collapses. He is found more dead than alive. After Bob has carried Irene home in his arms he receives the welcome news that George has confessed to having placed the jewels in the cloak to cast the blame on Irene. Irene finally recovers from the effects of the cold.

GEM

ONE DAY (Dec. 17).—Laure, a French Canadian trapper, and his wife live in the Northwest woods. He is a typical ignorant man of the brute type, and his treatment of his wife is such as one would accord to a dog. The wife never resents this but expects it as part of her lot until one day a New York artist on a hunting expedition meets her. He sees the treatment of the woman and his soul rises in anger against the treatment. He shows her the courtesies one would accord a great lady and it awakens in her a vista of a new life. Laure sees the treatment of the artist and mistakes it for love and watches the two. An accident occurs whereby the artist rescues Laure from accident and a friendship springs up between the two, but it is not strong enough to allay the suspicions of the jealous trapper. One day he catches the two together and covers the artist with his gun and takes him off to kill him. A fight ensues between the two men. The wife watches in fear and anguish and the artist triumphs. Then at the end the artist explains that what Laure mistook for love was just the ordinary courtesy a man should show a woman and opens the eyes of the trapper to a new view of life. The artist leaves them happy in their new life.

REX

MOTHER (Dec. 19).—Robert Norton, a young business man, loses his wife, who leaves him a young baby! He grieves so much about his wife's death that he makes up his mind to seek forgetfulness in traveling. He leaves his little baby in the charge of his Aunt Margaret. Katherine Morre, a nurse, is in great difficulties and is left penniless with a little baby. She makes up her mind to abandon it to the charge of some one who will take care of it. She leaves it on the doorstep of Margaret's house and she gives it shelter. Soon after, Norton's baby is taken ill and dies. Margaret is afraid of Norton's anger and determines to substitute the abandoned baby of the nurse for the dead child.

The child grows up and Norton returns from his wanderings to claim his child. He takes the substituted child to his own home. In the meantime the real mother calls upon Margaret and is told that her baby died, and she leaves heartbroken. The Norton child is taken away and is seriously injured in an automobile accident and a doctor and nurse is called in. The nurse is Katherine. By some curious intuition the child and the nurse become deeply attached to each other, and Norton becomes extremely jealous of the child's preference for her nurse. Norton discharges her and she is about to leave the house when a letter comes from Aunt Margaret, who is now dying. In the letter she confesses that she substituted the children, and the child he now believes his own is the child of Katherine, the nurse. By the aid of the little one Norton sees his error and the nurse becomes a permanent institution in the family household.

BEFORE THE WHITE MAN CAME (Dec. 17).—This story is founded on the old Apache legend of the Willow and the Sunbeam. These two, so the story goes, were playmates and companions until one day the parents of Willow, the boy, seized with the wanderlust, took him away with them to find a new home, far away in the wilderness. He bade his little friend good-bye and promised some day to return to her. Of the fifteen odd years that intervene the legend has nothing to tell. But at the end of that time Fang, the war chief of a neighboring tribe, comes to Brown Bear, father of the Sunbeam and chieftain of his tribe, with rich offerings of fur, the trophies of his prowess on the hunt. In exchange for these gifts he wishes to take the Sunbeam with him to brighten and warm the cold gray stone of his home cave.

Brown Bear, pleased with his regard, and the fur, consents to the trade. Sunbeam, however, dislikes the man and, refusing, runs away in tears. It is thus that Willow, the wanderer, returning at last, finds the object of his desires. He reassures her, and as he is telling her of his wanderings, Fang, looking for his acquisition, appears, demanding her. Willow, too, lays claim to her, and they go forthwith to lay their respective cases before the Bear.

He, although greatly pleased at the return of the Willow, holds to his agreement, and Fang drags her, protesting, away. Not long after this the old Bear died, leaving the chieftainship in the hands of Willow. He immediately uses his power, and starts out on a lone quest to bring the Sunbeam back to her people. This he accomplishes by strength and daring. Fang, discovering his loss, sends the old tribal challenge to battle, an arrow-pierced skull, and Willow, receiving it, according to custom withdraws the arrow and, breaking it, sends it back.

Events follow rapidly. Fang leaves his tribe to wait for him while he, taking advantage of the unprotected state of the village, steals back Sunbeam. In the meantime Willow and his tribe have discovered the waiting warriors of Fang. By a clever ruse these are led into an ambush and annihilated. Fang, returning with the girl to find his men, finds only their remains, and the victorious tribe of Willow. Willow sees him and gives chase. Fang seeing he must face the Willow, kills the girl rather than chance her going to the other. Then it is man to man. Fang flees, and in fleeing stumbles while crossing a stream. The Willow catches him there and, by main strength, forces his head under water and holds it there until he drowns.

"And afterwards," says the legend, "the Willow would visit her resting place and mourn, till at length madness seized him and, crying out aloud, "Sunbeam, I come to thee!" he took his life, and from then it was that their souls wandered, and will wander throughout all time—through the Valley of Shadows—together."

MILANO

LOVE SUBLIME (2 reels) (Dec. 21).—Love is blind to the faults of the object of its devotion; it adores, it idolizes, it is self-sacrificing, it is fond, it is foolish.

Ida's love was more than this; it was sublime, grand, noble, majestic. Happiness reigned supreme in the home of the Baron Dupre; his two motherless daughters, grown to womanhood, were a source of comfort and pride.

Ida, the elder daughter, recently betrothed to the young Count Alfred, and Rosa, the younger daughter, expected to arrive home from the convent where she had recently completed her studies.

Alfred was spending several weeks at the home of his fiancee, for preparation had been made to give a grand ball in honor of Rosa's return home, and at which she was to meet her father's friends and neighbors. Arriving some time before the date set for the reception she was delegated to entertain her sister's intended husband, as Ida was occupied with the preparations incidental to the ball. The pity of it all; Count Alfred, fascinated by the fresh young beauty of Rosa, transfers his affection, and by every art of the worldly-wise man, plays upon her innocence and inexperience.

The big-hearted Ida, confiding and unsuspecting, feels thankful that the young folks are amusing themselves so thoroughly, leaving her free to attend her duties. But her eyes are opened, for like a bolt from a clear sky she learns that her confidence has been abused.

Upon the night of the reception, as hostess her guests command her every attention and, seeking the seclusion of the conservatory for a brief rest, she overhears her affianced husband addressing her sister in terms of endearment. Wounded to the quick, she hides her anguish from her guests and at the first opportunity seeks the solace of the gardens, there to give vent to her grief, but is prevented from doing so by the approach of Baron Holden, an aged millionaire banker.

The Baron has long been an admirer of Ida and takes this opportunity to declare his love. With the directness of the practical business man he comes to the point at once, declaring that while he does not expect her to love him as she would a younger man, nevertheless he is convinced he can at least win her respect.

Ida naturally declines, but with the persistence that made him successful in business, the Baron reminds her that she may change her views, and if ever she does he will be waiting for her.

After the guests have deserted and the members of the household have retired Ida discovers her sister secretly leaving the house. Silently she follows, only to witness a clandestine meeting in the garden with her intended and overhear their confession of love for each other.

After a sleepless night, Ida concludes there is only one course left for her to follow. This noble woman has been almost a mother to her younger sister, loving her devotedly, and resolves that notwithstanding the heartache it will cause, her duty is to make Rosa happy. Next morning she returns to Count Alfred his ring, with a note, releasing him from his promise to her.

Ida realizes she is too late, her last sacrifice is of no avail, the object of her devotion has carried out his cowardly threat.

CINES—GEORGE KLEINE

AS FATE WILLS (Dec. 17).—The beautiful Margaret Wharton is the leader of a fashionable set, whose whole existence has become one round of extravagance and gaiety. She has a host of admirers, the most favored of whom being Frank Deering, who is her devoted attendant.

One day she is pleased to receive a visit from one of her former school friends, Helen Morley. Helen is a timid slip of a girl, with quiet ways, and much abashed at the attention she receives from Margaret's guests. Her charming manner at once attracts all of them, especially Frank, who falls madly in love with her.

Much of the time he formerly spent with Margaret he now devotes to her guest. Margaret, at first, wonders at this change in him and rebukes his seeming absent-mindedness, but after putting him to the test several times she is ultimately forced to acknowledge the bitter truth.

In a sudden burst of anger she hastens to Helen's room and denounces her disloyalty and ingratitude. Tears and explanations follow, and a pathetic scene ends in Margaret's insisting upon sacrificing her own interests and devoting her entire attention to the happiness of her friend.

THE CONSEQUENCES (Dec. 20).—Robert Insley, a rising young lawyer, is engaged to marry Edna Markham, the daughter of a well-to-do widow, who owns a good-sized farm. Insley rides out to visit his fiancee quite often and the future of the young couple seems a bright one.

One day, Harry Blount, a wealthy middle-aged speculator drives out to the Markham farm in his automobile in order to offer the widow a price for it. While there he meets Edna and immediately falls in love with her fresh young beauty and decides to win her for his wife. He buys the farm at a good price, Insley acting for the widow in closing the deal. Then Blount flatters the widow, takes Edna automobiling and otherwise makes himself generally agreeable. He finally obtains the widow's consent to his marrying Edna, and between them they force her to dismiss Insley and send him out of her life forever. The parting between the lovers is a most touching one, Insley giving her up only because he loves her too dearly to stand in the way of her making a wealthy match.

Two years elapse, during which time Insley has risen in his profession and Edna has had every luxury showered upon her, for Blount proves to be a good husband. One day in a cafe Insley and Edna meet, she being accompanied by her husband and mother. At Insley's invitation they join him at luncheon. While they are seated at the table a French count, a friend of Blount's comes over to them and he also becomes a member of the party. As they are about to leave, Blount invites the Count and Insley to become members of a house party he is going to give the following week. The Count accepts instantly, but Insley hesitates and the sight of Edna fans into flame all of the smouldering embers of his former love and he dreads to be near her, for fear he will betray his feelings toward her. Edna also realizes that she still loves Insley better than any man on earth and that wealth and luxury cannot appease heart anger, but she wants him near her again and so urges him to accept, which he hesitatingly does. The house party proves a big success and all are happy with the exception of Insley, who cannot bear to see Edna the wife of another man. The Count has admired Edna for a long time and now seeks to pay his low advances to her. Edna at last convinced of his baseness, spurns him indignantly and forbids his ever speaking to her again. That night at midnight as she is going to her room she meets Insley coming in from the outside, bareheaded. She sees traces of suffering on his face and asks the cause. He requests an interview with her and they go outside to a rustic summer house. Here he tells her he must go away at once and never see her again. As he stoops to kiss her hands in farewell, the Count, who has been following them, comes upon them. Noticing the action he hurries away to inform Blount. He finds him alone in his library and asks him to return with him, as he wishes to do him a great favor. Blount insists upon knowing the trouble and upon the Count informing him that his wife is faithless to him, Blount calls him a liar and slaps him. The Count draws a revolver and attempts to shoot Blount, but the latter succeeds in wrenching it from him, and, being closely pressed, he shoots the Count. In the meantime Insley and Edna have entered the hallway and have heard the quarrel and the shot fired. Insley urges her to retire and, taking her almost up in his arms, he carries her across the hall just as Blount enters and sees them. Believing now the truth of the Count's accusation, Blount goes out. Insley then rushes into the room, picks up the revolver and tells the Count, who is still alive, that he deserves what he received for trying to ruin a woman's name. At this point the guests all rush in as do Blount and Edna. The Count is asked who shot him and he points at Insley and dies. Insley starts to defend himself and stops, for only by accusing Edna's husband and proving that he himself was outside alone with her at midnight can he do it. Edna starts to exonerate him when she catches Blount's eye, who by the force of his glance compels her to keep silent, he deciding that it will be the easiest manner of ridding himself of his wife's lover to have him convicted of murder. Through bribery Edna finally obtains Insley's release, he going away because she begs him to. Years later, Blount, accompanied by Edna and her mother, lies dying in a hotel in a distant land and, being a Roman Catholic, sends for a priest, and when he comes it is no other than Robert Insley. Blount, at sight of the man whose whole life he has ruined, is seized with mad terror and dies. Insley performs what office he can for the dead man, and leading Edna to the bedside, he kneels with her praying for the soul of the departed. They rising and blessing her he returns to his own room, and kneeling before the crucifix, while the light of the setting sun streams over his face, he prays, "Thy will, not mine, be done."

URBAN ECLIPSE

THREE ROGUES OUTWITTED (Dec. 18).—Percy is spending a pleasant evening with friends in the neighborhood when suddenly, he remembers that he must "call up" his house. The servant answers, but the conversation is violently cut off with the cry of "thieves" and the sound of a struggle.

Percy, accompanied by two of his friends, hastens homeward and enters the house just as the thieves are leaving. A merry chase then ensues over fences, ditches and buildings. The three rogues are extremely nimble and seem to be gradually distancing their pursuers until Percy has a clever scheme to ensnare them, as the film will best describe.

On the same reel:

PICTURESQUE DALMATIC.—Owing to the hostilities in the Balkan States, Dalmatia has lately been drawn more into the public eye. We are taken upon a trip along the coast visiting the military posts, Grovosa, Pola and Ragusa, which are well equipped with garrisons and harbor defenses.

GAUMONT

A HAZARD FOR A HEART (Dec. 19).—Nordiska, an operatic prima donna, has a throng of idolaters, among whom are three Parisian men about town, all of whom vie for her favor. After the performance one evening the three adorers take the diva on the round of the lobster palaces and spend their good money like Pittsburgh millionaires. It is suggested that the four go slumming. Getting down into the apache belt, they enter one den and are much interested in the social doings of the underworld. In the course of their stay, a particularly elemental apache comes in to find his pet sweetheart. In the course of a wild catch-as-catch-can dance with a rival the cave man hurls his rival to the none too soft floor and trouble in the most threatening form is imminent. The new arrival overawes the weaker man and his is the girl to have and to hold. Nordiska and her companions had momentarily expected to find themselves picking portions of glassware and furniture out of their anatomies, but are pleased that no such violence occurs. Nordiska is peculiarly fascinated by the brute strength and ferocity of the King Apache, and as she and her three companions leave the place she darts ardent glances at this sovereign of the low lives.

The three gentlemen have been importuning Nordiska to become the wife of one of them. It is difficult for her to make a choice, so she finally writes a letter to each, saying that courage being the quality she most admires in man, she will become the wife of him who performs an act audacious and brave. One of the trio, who had noticed the singer's attraction for the apache has a daring thought. He gains admission secretly to the singer's house while dressed in his evening clothes and changes this attire for one of a burglar. He puts on a false mustache and, armed with a revolver, enters the songbird's room. He frightens her into giving him her jewels. As he sits in a chair the diva is perforce compelled to sing and dance before him. So seductive, so soothing is her mellifluous voice and her witching movements in the mazes of the dance that it exerts as hypnotic influence over the amateur burglar. While he is in this state of trance the singer hastens to the street and quickly returns with two policemen. In her absence, however, the spell having been removed, her lover escapes into the room where he has left his open-face clothes. As the singer and the policemen are searching for him he enters the room where they are, in his proper state of attire, carrying the burglar outfit and the jewels he had taken. He acknowledges himself as the intruder. The policemen are about to hustle him off to jail when he hands Nordiska the letter he had received and which had given him the suggestion. The singer recognizes that this is the man capable of creating and executing an act of audacity and bravery, and immediately tells the policemen that they will not be needed and that they had better send round a minister and a best man.

A PEACH FOR A PRISONER (Dec. 24).—The Marchioness de Rochfort has determined upon having her nephew and heir apparent, the Marquis Roger de Beauford, marry her god-child Dera. She acquaints him of this fact by letter and he answers, that it is awfully good of you, Old Top, so sweet that it's sticky, but I do not fancy the idea of exiling myself from the gay court and all its pleasures. While at his country seat, Roger, in the midst of hospitalities, is mystified by a mysterious masked stranger who hands him a note, "Someone is dying of love for you. If you wish to meet her, follow the bearer of this note." Interested, Roger follows and finds himself in the house of his aunt. The marchioness tells him that she will have her way regarding his marriage to Dera, and that he shall be confined on a diet of bread and water until he shall have agreed. The Marquis is not ready to thrust his shoulders into double harness, but admits that the enforced diet is worse than living on ten cents a day and relatives. He finds that the water is very fresh, too fresh indeed. From the window he sees a blithesome miss with the charm and bloom of the rural maid. He is interested. The maid sympathizes with him in his penal removal from the good things of the table, and she plunders the peach orchard, some of whose fruit she brings to the prisoner. Her passion climbs to such a point that she takes a ladder and puts it up to the window, affording means of escape. His heart is affected by these good samaritan actions and he takes her out walking in the garden. She admits that if he kisses her, he won't have to beg her pardon. Stern auntie happens along and the Marquis learns that the girl who had assisted him was she whom his aunt wanted him to marry. He remarks that he always did like peaches and that the episode is just like a motion picture play. And they were married, soon divorced, and then live happily ever after.

CRYSTAL

HIS WIFE'S STRATAGEM (Dec. 22).—Jabez Hardy, a hard-hearted old bachelor, discharges his nephew Chester from his employ because he married without the old gentleman's consent. Pearl, Chester's wife, whom uncle had never seen, decides to get a position in uncle's office with a view of getting Chester his job back. She is engaged as typist and uncle is very much smitten with her. He pays her attentions and one evening insists upon seeing her home. She invites him in and Chester seeing them coming, hides. The old gent is making love to Pearl, when Chester enters the room with a gun and pretends to be very angry. He recognizes his uncle, and after expressing his surprise, introduces him to his wife. Uncle congratulates the pair and leaves the couple serene in the belief that Chester will be re-employed. However, uncle despatches a letter to Chester telling him that as his wife is such a treasure he has no need of any other, so he has made a will leaving his entire fortune to a Chinese Missionary Fund. The young couple are very much chagrined, but have to make the best of the plot that failed.

A refined comedy with Miss Pearl White as the wife. Very creditably portrayed.

On the same reel:

MIXED BOTTLES.—Claude Belmont, the poet, is very fond of Jessamine. Also is he very fond of liquor. So is his housemaid. He keeps a bottle of whiskey in the drawer of his desk, where, it being discovered by Bridget, she helps herself. Claude discovers a shrinkage in his stock and decides upon a novel scheme to stop the purloining of his precious stock. He pours the whiskey into a bottle labelled "Carbolic Acid," and pours some crude oil into the whiskey bottle. He then goes out and proposes marriage to Jessamine and is rejected. He vows that he will kill himself. Meanwhile Bridget is entertaining her friend, the policeman, and goes up for some of the whiskey. She brings down two glasses full and she and the policeman drink it. They both become very sick, the crude oil doing its work well. Claude comes home, and being absent-minded, takes a drink of what he thinks is the whiskey. He, too, is taken very sick, and Jessamine, who has followed him to the house, finds him in a lamentable condition. She determines to join him in death, and drinks from the bottle marked "Carbolic Acid," only to find that it contains whiskey. She runs out of the house and is done with Claude forever, while the three unlucky whiskey lovers await the passing of their seemingly unending agony.

An original farce very capably acted, with a laugh in every move.

AMERICAN

THE DAUGHTERS OF SENOR LOPAZ (Dec. 16).—The simple act of discharging a worthless laborer has marked influence on the destinies of the two daughters of the Spanish merchant, Senor Lopaz. The laborer, Jose Carillo, is one of that worthless type of Spaniard who, through their own worthlessness, brings misfortune upon themselves, and when Senor Lopaz discharges him, he takes it as a personal grievance, and in the intensity of his hot Spanish nature, swears revenge. According to the custom of their people, the eldest daughter, Madeline, is afforded lenient privileges over the younger sister, Inez, and it is the desire of the father that she be the first of the sisters to marry. Madeline is a frequent visitor at her father's store, and it is during one of these visits that she first comes in contact with the Senor Trevino, who is the son of a very wealthy grandee of the neighborhood. On the same day, Inez, desiring something of her father, visits the store and is called to account for her appearing in public, which is against the custom of their people. She also met the Senor Trevino, who immediately becomes infatuated with her beauty and escorts her to her home. They are in pleasant converse when Inez espies her father and sister returning home, and, realizing that she will be punished for her pertinency, she runs away from the young senor, who turns to greet the father and older daughter. They are very courteous to the young man as they regard his great wealth and possessions particularly attractive in view of the marriageable daughter. Immediately following his departure they go to their home and censure Inez for her boldness. They remind her that the older daughter has the preference always and that until after the marriage of Madeline she must remain in the background. The senor Trevino, finding it impossible to court the younger daughter decides to write her a letter in hope of seeing her again. Accordingly, he sends a messenger with the following letter:

"Senorita Lopaz:

"May I call for you at 8 to stroll in the moonlight?

"Humbly,

"Gustave Trevino."

Filled with delight that the grand senor should desire to meet her, she conceals the letter, and when evening arrives, she goes to meet him. She is stopped by her father and elder sister, who noted her departure from the house and they ask her where she is going. Always truthful, Inez shows them the letter, and the elder sister suggests to her father that she herself pretend to be the recipient of the note and go to meet the Senor Trevino. The father readily accedes and, rebuking Inez, he sends her back to the house. Madeline goes to keep the tryst and carries the deception so well that the young man is forced to show her every courtesy, believing that she actually received his note. At the Lopaz home Inez awakens to her love for the senor and becomes rebellious of the restrictions placed upon her and plans to run away. She leaves a note for her father, telling him that it is useless for him to seek her, and hurries from the house. She is observed by Jose Carillo leaving the house. He seeks an opportunity for revenge and follows her. Out in the open country he accosts her and seizing her, drags her down the steps of an old ruin, planning to hold her for ransom.

In the meantime the father has found the note and, almost distracted, he hurries to find Madeline and shows the note to her, and the young Senor Trevino cannot conceal his concern and tells the father that he will find her at any cost. Senor Lopaz notifies his laborers of the disappearance of his daughter Inez, and they all join in the search. Trevino, out in the open country, rushes about calling her name, and as he approaches the ruins, hears a faint answer to his call. With a rush he is down the steps and attacks her captor. The laborer is strong and wiry and it is not until assistance comes that they are able to overcome the miscreant.

Trevino leads Inez back to her father, who is so delighted at seeing her again that he readily gives his consent to her marriage to the young Senor Trevino.

THE POWER OF LOVE (Dec. 19).—Old Captain Blount, having retired from the sea, has taken his abode among the fishermen on the coast in order to be near the ocean. As a captain, he had been tyrannical, and now, no longer having a crew to dominate, he tries to direct the lives of his two daughters in much the same manner as he would handle mutiny. Among the young fishermen, Bob Newcomer has found favor with the old "salt," and when he expresses a desire to marry the Captain's oldest daughter, Martha, the father told her to prepare to wed the fisherman without consulting her as to whether her suitor found favor in her eyes or not. Upon a Cliff ranch two young cowboys, Jack Woomer and Pete Neville, are employed. They had met Martha and Mabel Blount and had learned to love them. Bob Newcomer discovers this and notifies the old Captain. Together they interrupt one of the meetings and the father upbraids his daughters. But the cowboys are not without resource. They go to the village, where they secure licenses, and then await the arrival of the circuit-riding minister, who makes periodical trips in the vicinity. On the day of his arrival they secure his service, and, calling the girls, are married in the open air. Again the suspicious Newcomer has been watching, and hurrying to the Captain, tells him of the marriage of his two daughters.

Pete Neville and his bride start down to interview the irate father and procure his forgiveness when Newcomer raises his gun and kills the young bridegroom. Startled at the sound of firing, Jack Woomer and his newly made wife hurry down and come upon the tragedy. Newcomer and the Captain have called a number of fishermen and they take Martha from the young husband by force and promise him the same fate that Neville received if he ever comes that way again. Woomer returns to the ranch and calls on the cattlemen to return with him and avenge the death of their pal. They start for the beach and are soon engaged in conflict. Mabel, crazed with grief over the death of her husband, wanders away to the treacherous rocks in the ocean. While the conflict is on, Martha sees her husband on the cliffs and hurries to join him, followed by the ever watchful Newcomer. Woomer and Newcomer fight and Woomer succeeds in throwing his adversary over the cliffs. Reunited, the husband and wife return to her father's home and put an end to the useless warfare, but they are too late. The old Captain had fought his last fight and they find him lying in the doorway. Sick at heart they wander toward the beach seeking Mabel, and at ebb tide they find her where the treacherous ocean has throw her, for she has gone to join her husband in the land beyond.

EDISON

FOG (Dec. 13).—This is another of the English productions and is one of Bannister Merwin's strongest stories.

We are introduced to Liz, an East Side vendor of vegetables, and we see her driving her moke through the east end of London. The next scene shows Lady Cecily, of Park Lane, breaking a pearl necklace which the Honorable Jack Penderberry offers to have repaired for her. As the Honorable Jack leaves the house and travels past Hyde Park corner and down Piccadilly, a London fog begins to fill the air, and soon he finds himself wandering helplessly in its obscurity.

A member of the underworld, familiarly called "the rat," who has been talking with Liz and her father, hears a sound in the distance and, following the scent, comes up behind the Honorable Jack and bowls him over with a blow on the head. The handsome young man falls at the feet of Liz, and when "the rat" comes to complete his work and rob his victim, Liz, who has been struck by the looks of the stranger, protects him. Her father backs her up and "the rat" is sent about his business while Liz and her father take Jack home. They find that he has entirely lost his memory of the past and Liz decides that she will keep him and make him learn to love her, so she hides the pearls in what she considers a safe place and Jack begins a different liffe, which continues until Lady Cecily joins a slumming party one night and stumbles into a restaurant where Jack and Liz are having supper. Then the cloud clears from Jack's mind, but Lady Cecily seeing him with Liz cannot understand the situation and refuses to hear any explanations.

That night in the wharf cottage, Liz realizes that she has really lost the man she loves and that his happiness depends on her making his peace with the girl he loves. She makes the sacrifice, and finding Lady Cecily at home, tells her how it all happened.

There is a sensational scene in the cottage in which Jack's life is saved from an attack by "the rat," and Liz completes her self-sacrifice.

The story is tellingly and convincingly played by the Edison forces, both English and American, and should find a hearty welcome on both sides of the Atlantic.

A CHRISTMAS ACCIDENT (Dec. 14).—The Giltons are next door neighbors to the Biltons. The houses are exactly alike and adjoin each other; the back yards are even unseparated by a fence.

Gilton is a crabbed old money-maker and childless, while his wife has grown submissive through years of continual nagging.

The Biltons are a happy family of seven; poverty and scrimping have not soured them. The struggle to maintain his wife and the little ones have left Bilton threadbare, it is true, but the loving wife and five pairs of little arms that crept around his neck each morning and night were worth the fight. The fact that old Gilton fumed and fussed about the children sometimes stepping over the line of his back yard, bothered him only in so far as he disliked discord, and when Gilton's dog was poisoned Bilton was as sorry as though it had been his own, yet old Gilton accused him of having been the poisoner. Even the heartbroken sobs of Cora Cordelia, Bilton's sweet little daughter, over the death of her canine playfellow, failed to convince the crusty old man.

When the grocer's boy delvered Gilton's order to Mrs. Bilton and she cooked the dinner, thinking her husband had sent the things home, Gilton was almost ready to commit murder.

As Christmas approached the Biltons were hard-pressed, but gave their little store to the children to buy presents, telling them that Santa Claus was too poor to leave them a turkey.

On Christmas eve old Gilton staggered home in a blizzard, the turkey for Christmas dinner under his arm. On the porch that led to the twin doors of his house and Bilton's a terrific gust of wind and snow closed his eyes, and horror of horrors, he entered the home of the hated neighbor. Blinded and cold, his entire figure snow-covered, he stepped into the midst of the Bilton's, gathered as they were about the table laden with the cheap presents, listening open-mouthed to Bilton reading "The Night Before Christmas." The children's vision of cheery Santa was rudely interrupted by Gilton's snow-covered figure. To them he was a real Santa Claus.

In a beautiful closing scene old Gilton's flinty eyes filled with tears and the breach between the families is closed as though the spirit of Santa Claus himself had welded it.

LUBIN

HIS WESTERN WAY (Dec. 19).—A Western born girl and boy have grown up from childhood, sweethearts. The girl's mother has social ambitions and compels the father and the girl to move to the city. The girl, enraptured over the prospects of seeing things, refuses to marry her sweetheart and goes with her parents to the city and meets with a man about town. He proposes and she accepts, much to the delight of the mother and the chagrin of the father, who is a true Westerner. The cowboy misses his playmate, and his father finding him in the corral deep in thought, tells his son to go get the gal and bring her home. The boy, who is made of the right stuff, says, "I will," and goes to the city, there to find that the girl has absorbed the artificial stimulus caused by environment. He starts to return to the station to go back home when he runs across the man about town, who is under the influence of liquor and showing his sweetheart's picture to a pal, bragging over his conquest. The cowboy promptly takes the picture from him and knocks him down, returns to the home of the girl and tells her father the conditions. The boy enters the sitting-room, finds the mother and daughter drinking tea, and tells the girl he wants her to go back with him, but she refuses. He then, for the first time in his life, clasps her in his arms, and by force, takes a real lover's kiss. The girl then realizes that she has loved him all the time, and, against her mother's protests, puts on her things and goes with him. They pick up her father and take him back to the mountains, where the friends tried and true meet them and they are married the minute the train reaches the mountain station. As the train leaves everybody waves, wishing them good luck.

HOGAN VS. SCHMIDT (Dec. 20).—Widow Hogan, a very respectable woman with a family of four children, is very much admired by Herman Schmidt, who owns the house she lives in and to whom she owes considerable rent. For his leniency he is permitted to spend many happy hours at the Hogan's home, but there was Tim Timergan, who also admired the widow, and a rivalry existed between Schmidt and himself, which caused many a fist fight, including a serious duel. The two Misses Hogan, Fanny and Lucy, also have many admirers, among same, one who was a great, husky fighter named Push Miller, and Percy Melville, a little mama's boy, who showed attention to the fighter's sweetheart. On one occasion the fighter became so much annoyed at mama's boy's attention to Fanny that he challenged him to a fight, which they proceeded to carry out. The fighter was so exasperated that he allowed Percy to get the best of him, but followed it up by chasing him for life. The preparation for a reception is in progress at the Hogan home and the guests arrive and are seated at the table. In the meantime Schmidt and Timergan have patched up their differences temporarily and are placed at the head of the table. Everything is going along smoothly for the birthday dinner when in rushes Percy chased by Miller, over table, chairs, etc. Finally everybody takes a hand, a general fight takes place and everything winds up in the usual atmosphere of Hogan enjoyment.

SOLAX

FINGER PRINTS (Dec. 25),—Hooknose Jake is released from prison and vows to get even with the District Attorney who sent him there. Harry Sterling, the District Attorney, is in love with the daughter of Walter Burdet, a banker and broker. The old banker refuses, however, to give his consent to the marriage, and Sterling leaves in a resentful and unhappy frame of mind, while the daughter uphraids her father for his unwarranted objection to the match.

Hooknose Jake has spied on the District Attorney and shadows him from place to place. He is up against it, not having been able to secure employment, and plans to rob and kill the banker and shift the blame to the District Attorney.

The offices of the District Attorney are opposite the banker's offices and Hooknose Jake takes advantage of the fact, by shooting from Sterling's office across to the banker, with a noiseless revolver. Naturally a big stir is created throughout the city, and after some investigation, the police figure that Sterling is the guilty man, and circumstantial evidence almost convicts him.

A young detective on the case examines carefully the murdered body and finds finger prints on the white vest of the dead banker. These he secures for his own purposes and follows up the investigation. He assumes various disguises and not only shadows the District Attorney and takes occasion to compare Sterling's finger prints with the finger prints on the dead man's vest, but also learns of Hooknose Jake's activity. He follows up the clue, and one evening finds Jake in the office of the District Attorney. Jake is there placing more evidence to incriminate his enemy. However, just as the detective is about to hide behind the curtain, the criminal sees his reflection in a mirror. A fight and a spectacular chase down fire escapes ensues, in which the criminal makes a getaway. In the struggle the dirty hands of Jake impress themselves on the cuffs of the detective. The detective compares the finger prints on his cuffs with those on the dead banker's vest and is sure of his man. Later, in trying to overdo himself, Jake sends a message to the police informing them that they would find evidence against the District Attorney. The detective traces down the source of the telegram and finds Jake in his den.

THE GIRL BEHIND THE MAN (Dec. 27).—This is a moral story of married life of today, showing what a great influence a young wife has on her husband.

Two couples start out in life, after a honeymoon. One couple has the prospect of living on a hundred dollars a week and the other couple is forced to live on twenty-five dollars a week.

The twenty-five dollar a week pair are satisfied with their existence and live within their income; they are happy, the husband is industrious—makes his way in his position, and his wife is a helpmate and gives him encouragement to forge ahead.

On the other hand, the other couple, who have an income of one hundred dollars a week are discontented because of the woman's extravagances. Instead of living within her income she expresses her dissatisfaction and nags at her husband, and scolds him for earning so little money. She buys new clothes very often and spends twice the money he makes, thus causing him to go into debt—and in order to make both ends meet, he is forced to steal.

During the time that the twenty-five dollar a week couple have been making their way ahead, prospering and becoming successful, the other couple continually keep going down the ladder. The end finds this couple separating. The woman in poverty about to take the only road open to a poor woman with extravagant tastes, and the man we find in a saloon disheveled and shabby, about to be thrown out by the bouncer.

LUX

CLEANLINESS IS NEXT TO GODLINESS, BUT! (Dec. 20).—Arabella, the general servant, is expecting a visit from her people. They arrive, but her mistress will not let her go out until the housework is done. Her relatives decide to give her a hand with her work. They use more water than discretion, and thus cause much amusing trouble.

On the same reel:

ONLY THE CHIROPODIST.—An amusing farce in which a jealous husband mistakes the chiropodist for an unwelcome lover. When he recognizes his mistake he is so anxious to make amends that when the lover does arrive he mistakes him for the chiropodist.

PAT AND THE MILLINER (Dec. 27).—Pat is a young man about town and passes his days in idleness. Suddenly he is seized by an energetic spasm, and decides to go to work. The reason of this sudden hurst of energy is to be found in a little milliner's shop. The charming young lady within has captivated Patrick's heart, and he decides to apply for the situation as page boy, which is vacant at the shop.

On the same reel:

A NEW USE FOR A BIKE.—Sporty, the cyclist, has plenty of money and is an extremely popular young chappie. He wins the great international cycle race from Tokio to Paris, and this noble feat of strength causes a great love for him to blossom within the heart of Sophie Pancake, a suffragette, whose charms are doubtful and whose beauty is not even skin deep. This lady follows her beloved hero wherever he goes, and he does not find her attentions to his liking.

Immediately after the race Sporty looks out for some comfortable place where he may rest with all the bachelor's ease. When he obtains his flat and seeks to get his furniture moved in, he is horror-stricken to find that the carmen have gone on strike and that it is out of the question to settle down in his new home. Tearing his luxuriant hair, and calling upon the heathen dieties (and other unmentionable persons) Sporty hastens to his friends, who are all crack cyclists, and they agree to assist him.

Taking their bikes they each take charge of a piece of furniture. One harnesses his bike to a grandfather's clock, and another to a chest of drawers, another to a table, and thus a lively procession is seen careening wildly down the street and vainly endeavoring to persuade the furniture to go quietly into its new home. The suffragette has hidden in the grandfather's clock, in the hope that she will be able to reach the new home of her adored Sporty. It is not to be wondered at when we state that the grandfather's clock never reaches its destination. An unavoidable collision with a lamp-post reduces it to matchwood, while most of the other furniture meets a similar fate.

RELIANCE

A FAIRYLAND BRIDE (Dec. 14).—Young Philip Gray finds his convalescence at a lonely farmhouse, a very dull affair. But when he commences to receive little notes and dainty bunches of posies from an unknown "fairy" things begin to look interesting once more. He makes inquiries, but can find no one who knows who this unknown girl can be. Often from his window he catches glimpses of a pretty golden head as the "fairy" steals away. One day, having recovered somewhat, he gives chase, finally catching her. But the exertion proves too much after his recent illness, and he faints. When he wakes he finds himself wrapped in a soft, warm blanket, and he knows it was the "fairy's" kindness that prompted this. He leaves a note for her on the tree asking her to meet him. She answers, and the consequence is a meeting in Dingle Dell. They become good frieids, and before long Philip asks the girl, whose identity he does not know, to become his wife. She consents and the ceremony is performed in Dingle Dell. She insists that Philip wear a handkerchief over his eyes all during the wedding, and when this is removed, he looks about to see all his old friends surrounding him. And prominent among them is his doctor, the father of the "fairy," who sent her into the country to bring back an interest in life and health to the poor invalid, who later won her heart and hand.

FIRES OF CONSCIENCE (2 reels) (Dec. 18).—Mabel Winter, engaged to Howard Wallis, is admired very much by Count de Gironde, who also admires her father's millions. Elizaheth Deacon is in love with Howard, and she and the Count get their heads together to devise some way in which they can separate the lovers. Their chance comes when Howard is called away from a ball to attend his mother, who is quite ill. He leaves a note for Mabel which is stolen and destroyed her attention, and the girl, hurt by her sweetheart's apparent neglect, believes her. Howard writes repeatedly to Mabel, hut his letters are all secured by the Count, who bribes the hutler to attain his end. Mabel, thinking that Howard has fallen in love with Elizabeth, accepts the Count's proposal, and they are married. Meantime Howard grieved over not hearing from Mabel reads of her marriage in the society column of the papers, and his heart is broken. He turns for consolation to the gambling tables, Sometime later Mabel's father loses his fortune in Wall Street and, the Count tired of his wife now that her money is gone, taunts her. In a quarrel hetween the Count and Elizabeth, Mabel learns the truth about her estrangement from Howard, and is bitterly grieved. She parts from her husband. Five vears later Mabel lives with her little son Bobby in a small tenement. The boy sells papers on the streets sometimes to help his mother. On a cold night the little chap starts out. He is not able to make a penny, and, tired out and discouraged, he sinks down on the steps of a large church and falls asleep. A charitable woman passing sees the little lad and drops a ten dollar gold piece in his hand. Howard, who has been playing roulette at a nearby gambling house, is refused further credit and leaves the place angrily. As he passes the church he sees the child and notes the money in his hand. As he picks up the gold piece he hears the church clock chiming the hour—it is 10 o'clock, the tenth of the month—and this oddly hestowed money is a ten dollar piece. He will borrow it from the boy for a while and play it on number ten. So he takes the money back to the gambling house and flings it down on ten. Ten wins and wins again. But the man's conscious troubles him—he sees the little lad starving on the street—he sees him dying. And all the while he, Howard, is winning more gold with a stolen piece of money. Breaking the bank he pockets a small fortune and rushes back to the church. Bobby lies still and cold. Howard gathers him into his arms and carries him into the church, where he is given over to the care of a kindly priest. Before the beautiful Easter altar, Howard confesses his sin to the priest. And taking out his money he scatters it upon the altar. It is tainted gold, he does not want it, it has cost the little boy's life. But Bobby is not dead—he had merely fainted from hunger. The priest carries him in alive and refreshed after a good supper. Howard takes the little fellow into his arms. Bobby tells his address, and a taxi is called. It stops before the poor tenement and Howard carries the child in to his anxious mother, who has been nearly crazed at his long absence. But when he sees it is Mabel, the woman he has loved all his life, his joy knows no bounds. Then he remembers her marriage. But Mabel shows him an old paper telling of the Count's death, by duel, in Paris. And Howard knows he has come into his own at last.

PATHE'S WEEKLY, NO. 51 (Dec. 16).

A RIVAL OF CARUSO (Dec. 17).—Why will people try to he something they are not? Everybody does it. Whiffles does it. He wants to give his sweetheart the impression that he is a fine singer, and as he has no voice he employs a capable tenor to supply the inusic from behind the screen while he makes the necessary facial expressions. In the midst of a song the voice ceases, but Whiffles goes on without it, much to everybody's amusement.

GLIMPSES OF MONTANA (Dec. 19).—The vastness of the agricultural industry in the great Northwest and the advances made in the mechanical aids to farming are shown in this film. Great tractor engines do the plowing, rolling, planting and harrowing in one operation. Enormous grain elevators are a common sight in the agricultural districts. There are scenes at the famous copper mines, showing the loading of the valuable ore, and interior views of one of the numerous smelters. Nothing seems to stop the onward march of the railroads. After leaving Great Falls, Montana, the ride is one of unusual beauty. Ahead of the train rise the blue, transparent-looking peaks of the Rockies. Passing the magnificent Gate of the Mountains the view turns into an immense ampitheatre of rock which nature has painted in a beautiful combination of never-fading tints.

On the same reel:

When the day arrives the butler is released and straightway he goes to visit Olga. The maid is anxious to be rid of him and while they embrace she places a necklace in his pocket. She then loudly accuses him of theft. Young Morley enters the room. He silences her accusation with the declaration that he has witnessed the entire performance from behind a curtain, and, happy that he has, in time, discovered the character of his bride-to-be, he orders her from the house.

Heartbroken, she wanders up Fifth avenue and looks in the window of a large mansion. There she sees her toys grouped around the Christmas tree of a wealthy little girl. She falls asleep on the steps and the little rich child, unknown to her parents, finds her and takes her to bed in her own room. The children fall asleep in each others arms and have a wonderful dream. The toys, led by "Jack in the Box," take the little girls to toyland and introduce them to Santa Claus. They watch Santa make his pretty toys. The dollies and tin soldiers dance for them and they are very much shocked when the mother of the rich child wakes them up and asks who the little waif is. Her daughter announces that she is a little girl that she has adopted and insists upon her sharing all her Christmas presents. The children have a happy time playing with the toys, but cannot quite understand why "Jack in the Box" refuses to talk to them as he did in their marvelous journey to toyland.

But a diet ordered by her doctor to reduce her weight has a wonderful effect upon her size, and she continues to shrink until her husband, who is taking a special course is physical culture, becomes the Bull Moose of his own pasture and the real fun begins.

On the same reel:

THE DEVIL OF A TIME.—A harmless inmate of an insane asylum escapes from his keepers and meets Algernon Rich on his way from a costumers with a "devil" costume under his arm. He appropriates the costume, and, dressed as his Satanic Majesty, starts on a series of adventures that lead to all kinds of amusing complications. He spends a pleasant evening in the home of Jack Sprat, and his wife, unknown to both of them and, by hiding under the dining-room table and alternately pulling Mrs. Sprat's hair and slapping Mr. Sprat on his bald pate, he succeeds in starting a record breaking family quarrel. The climax is reached when Mr. Sprat slams the bedroom door in his wife's face only to find the devil in his bed.

THE CHRISTMAS GIFT (Dec. 21).—This is designed to fit the holiday spirit and the makers feel assured that it will serve its purpose. A fond husband conceives that he will surprise his wife on Christmas with a diamond pendant and plans to keep all knowledge of this from her until his guests have been assembled at dinner. The wife makes similar preparation, but she uses better judgment in that she hides the present intended for her husband in a place where it remains safe. On the contrary the husband places his jeweled gift in the pocket of an old coat and takes it for granted that it will remain there when he is ready to spring his surprise. Christmas arrives and the guests are assembled. From the branches of a miniature tree everyone present receives a gift and hubby is chuckling because of the fact that his wife, apparently, is the only one overlooked. He excuses himself and hastens to his bedroom and reaches into the wardrobe for the old coat. It has disappeared. When he returns to the drawing room with this information his wife informs him that she had sold all his cast-off garments to a tailor on the preceding day. She has forgotten the tailor's name, but despite this, husband and wife leave their guests and start out on a wild goose chase for the knight of the needle and thread. Their mission carries them into many shops and their experiences are said to be most humorous, but finally they discover the old coat hanging in the window of a second-hand clothing store. Hubby pays a fancy price for the garment and is delighted to find that his gift still reposes in one of the pockets. When the couple return to their home they find that their guests have fallen asleep during the period of waiting. They are aroused and the presentation is formally made, after which the festivities are continued.

THE PEER OF ALL PROJECTING MACHINES

A prominent dealer in motion picture machines and supplies said recently that there isn't as much inducement for a dealer to handle Simplex projectors as some other machines, for he sold practically no repairs even for the machines which have been in service a year and a half; whereas he could count on selling $30 or $40 worth of parts per year for some of the other machines.

There is food for thought in that statement, Mr. Exhibitor and Mr. Operator.

Think beyond the first cost and into the future. What is the ultimate cost and sum total of satisfaction going to be?

Get wise and take a look at the Simplex before buying some other machine. We invite comparison.

THE TRUE ELEVATION OF THE INDUSTRY

LETTERS are coming to me from all points of the compass, asking me to write a strong editorial, protesting against the loose manner that films are being exploited on a long suffering exhibitor today. One exhibitor writes, "That if he puts on an ordinary release, his receipts go down, but if he displays a blood and thunder melodrama with a glaring colored poster on the outside, his receipts go up, and if he puts on the screen a feature film, and there is plenty of excitement, murders, robberies and such like, he doubles and trebles his receipts, and expresses himself, saying that is one reason why the manufacturers make such films." It is simply to supply a demand on the part of the public. This same correspondent takes me to task because I advocate the cutting out of murders, intrigues, and such like pictures, depicting the underworld of life. He says that all these films are passed by the National Board of Censorship, and asks what right have I to criticize films after passing such an august, educated body of people. This may be all very fine for my correspondent to speak thus, but he little knows the futility of the brand of film, labelled as he says because while the Board of Censors in New York City may pass films, yet as they say because they do not want the manufacturers to lose money, and that the Independents are not so rich as the Trust, so they have to smooth their consciences over and pass what in their hearts they strongly object to. This is the worst of having a Censorship Board subsidized by the manufacturers, who, as they pay the piper, consequently call the tune. If it were possible for the Censorship Board to be a recognized authority, backed by legal powers, it would be a different matter, as then every manufacturer would have to obey the orders.

Take Chicago for instance. The Censorship Board there, an authorized power in the Police Department, cuts out many scenes that the New York Censor Board passes, and scenes that the New York Censor Board does not pass, they write letters to Chicago asking them not to pass, and so there is no real power, but why is there any need for a Censorship Board? That is the question I would like answered. If the exhibitors would refuse to exploit films that they know contravene the best wishes of their patrons, they would be a Censor Board themselves, and I think it is a good opportunity for the National League to become the censors of every film shown by an exhibitor in his theatre, then there would be a general advancement all along the line, both in improvement and quality of the story, and the results of the picture. I want specially to call attention to the following excerpt from a letter I have received on the other side of the question as showing a difference of opinion even among exhibitors themselves.

"An article in your November 30th number, entitled 'Educational Films,' is of much interest. It is precisely this class of pictures that we desire to present to a large audience which assembles in our auditorium every Sunday afternoon. The seating capacity of our building is about 4,000, and the trustees dislike to present many of the 'mushy' films that are manufactured to-day. The very schemings, intrigues, suicides, criminality, vengeance, drunkenness, jealousy, duels, robbery, murder, gambling, etc., etc., is what we are trying to avoid, and still almost every reel sent us has one or more of these features that are disgusting to a high-class audience. I wish you would kindly refer this letter of ours to your friend, Mr. Rich G. Hollaman, and state to him that we would very thankfully receive films along the line which you describe in your article, viz: Travel, scenic, topical, educational, etc. If he will kindly supply us with them we will care for the charges connected therewith in line with his proposition to use his films. Our building is city property and we desire to promote educational features therein whenever possible."

Referring to the above, I would say that taking the spirit of the letter, and the statement that they want to gain a high-class audience, is the whole crux of the problem. If the theatres were equipped, and pictures were shown to attract educated audiences, the elimination of the worst of the films on the market today would be very easy. Educational films, and when I say educational, I do not mean the cut and dry sort of stuff necessary for a classroom, but films of an elevated, higher tone, showing good stories with good results. Talking with one of the largest exhibitors in New York City this past week, he said, "if the manufacturers had only sufficient material to give me a program I would never put a murder or a shooting or an intriguing picture on my screen, and this is what I am looking for, but it is not profitable to the manufacturers, and so what more can I say?"

If the above remarks are taken by the manufacturers in the true sense in which they are written, I feel sure that a great advancement along educational lines will be made early in the coming year.

Alfred H. Saunders.

FILM SUPPLY AND MUTUAL

The Reliance, Majestic, Thanhouser and American companies, Saturday, December 14th, withdrew from the Film Supply Company and hereafter all connected with the Mutual Film Corporation will do business directly through that organization, according to a statement made by H. E. Aitken, of the Mutual Corporation. He said that "the action of the Mutual in refusing to take pictures from the Film Supply Company was due to an effort to get the best possible programs."

In reference to the change President Herbert Blache, of the Film Supply Company, has this to say:

"The present situation is one that causes no grave concern to the Film Supply Company of America, or the manufacturers who are affiliated with the organization. We are in a position to assure our patrons that they will be served without interruption in service and that the result will prove more satisfactory to all concerned. It was largely due to the attitude of the Film Supply Company of America, that this severance of former relations was brought about.

M. P. PATENT CO. FILES ANSWER

Denying that it is a "trust" and insisting that prior to its organization "no lawful art, trade or commerce in motion pictures existed" the Motion Picture Patents Company, last week filed its answer in the United States District Court in Philadelphia, Pa., to the suit brought under the Sherman anti-trust law.

They answer that whatever lawful trade there is in the motion picture business was created by the defendants and is being maintained in good faith. It is also declared that by reason of "peculiar conditions" in the motion picture art the organization of the company and other defendants is necessary and lawful, not solely for the convenience and profits of the individual and corporate defendants, but to the lawful existence of the business.

In a statement it is declared that upward of $100,000 is involved, the greater part of which is owned by persons other than the defendants and that if the government's petition is granted much of the capital will be cast into its "former unlawful and infringing condition, and that "all free competition as now exists will be rendered hazardous."

PUTS FILM CENSORSHIP ON BOARD OF EDUCATION

With an amendment providing that the Board of Education exercise a censorship over all films used in moving picture theatres in New York, the Folks ordinance regulating such places was passed by the Board of Aldermen. Borough President McAneny and others expressed the opinion that the amendment was illegal, and that it had been tacked on for the Mayor to veto the entire measure.

Alderman John J. White, who is in the moving picture business, was the only one to vote against the ordinance.

The consideration of the ordinance was attended with considerable heated debate. It was only after Tammany members of the board had tried to stave off consideration of it that Alderman Dowling, Tammany leader, introduced the Board of Education amendment. It was apparent that the ordinance could not be passed without the amendment, so Alderman Folks, leader of the majority and father of the ordinance, accepted the amendment.

He passed word around to his colleagues that the Mayor could veto the censorship provision, permitting the rest of the ordinance to become a law. He based his opinion on Section 40 of the charter.

As the ordinance drawn up by the special commission of the Mayor did not contain any provision for official censorship of films, and as Canon Chase, who is not in the good graces of the Mayor, was one of those who suggested an official censorship for films, there seems to be little doubt that the Mayor will veto the entire ordinance, anyway, unless he can cut out the amendment.

The present censoring of films is done by the National Board of Censors, an unofficial organization, which derives much of its support from the film manufacturers themselves. It was charged at the board meeting that such censorship could not be said to be disinterested or effective.

Provisions of Ordinance

The Dowling amendment also specifies the nature of pictures that may be shown, excluding from exhibition such as would tend to incite to crime or immorality. The ordinance itself provides for increasing the maximum capacity of moving picture theatres to 600, for the fireproof and hygienic construction of the same and for strict supervision of the moral tone of the places by the Bureau of Licenses.

Alderman White declared the Mayor had been deceived in making his appointments to the committee that drew up the ordinance. "On that committee," he declared, "there were three representatives of Chicago interests."

He added that he had been approached by a representative of a film trust in Chicago and urged to pass an ordinance increasing the seating capacity of moving picture theatres here. He said William Fox, his partner in the moving picture business, had received an offer of $90,000 to sell out to the trust.

OHIO CONVENTION JANUARY 21-22, 1913

There will be big doings in Ohio on Tuesday, January 21, and January 22, 1913. The Ohio State Branch No. 1 of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America will hold their annual convention at Columbus Ohio. New officers will be elected, committees appointed, etc.

At the same time the Ohio State convention meets the national vice-presidents from thirty-three (33) States will meet in Columbus. The Ohio State convention will be very interesting as the State Legislature will be in session and the new Governor Hon. James M. Cox, will then be at the helm, and there are several bills which will affect the members of the State League of Ohio which will be introduced at the coming session of the Legislature. Naturally there is a great deal of interest being taken in the coming convention. The Attorney General is also very active and at that time will be working in conjunction with Senator Foraker's office and Hon. J. J. Lent's office in developments of legal points which will be left for the courts to decide.

The national vice-presidents will have a number of important matters to discuss and take care of. M. A. Neff, president of the Ohio State League, who has just returned from an extended and successful trip through the West, was in Columbus in consultation with Attorney General Hogan, and also arranging for the State convention.

In the next issue we will give the name of the hotel which will be chosen as headquarters, and where the convention will be held, as well as many other important details.

GREAT NORTHERN

An Emergency Waiter (Dec. 28).—This is a genuine comedy of errors and one that is calculated to cause the heartiest laughter wherever shown. Jack is a cobbler, who has a fondness for tipple, and he is very much under the weather when an opportunity presents itself to earn a few extra dollars by acting as an emergency waiter. It appears that a wealthy banker and his wife are giving a reception in their home when, at the last moment, they discover that one of the professional waiters has failed to turn up for duty. They must have another waiter and one of the servants is sent to the shop of Jim the tailor, who had been known to wait on table when not otherwise engaged. But on this occasion he has a prior engagement, but in order to be agreeable he sends the messenger to his friend, Jack the cobbler. The latter, as usual is tipsy and is inclined to decline the offer, but after being arrayed in a full dress suit loaned by the hostess, he reports for duty. He is barely able to navigate and, as a result, he drops his first armful of dishes as he staggers into the dining-room. Then to make matters worse, he spills soup into the lap of one of the lady guests. While committing these blunders he commences to see imaginary flies, and in waving them aside, breaks more crockery. The climax is reached when he picks cubes of sugar from the cups of the guests. He is thrown out of the house and wanders toward a boat wharf. Seeing an old tub handy, he decides to evade the flies by going out upon the water. While waving away the pests that appear to have followed him, he tumbles into the water and is rescued from drowning by a number of fishermen who are led by his faithful wife.

On the same reel the Balkan War is presented and should prove interesting.

NEW YORK HAS MAGNIFICENT NEW THEATRE FOR MOTION PICTURES AND VAUDEVILLE

THE $2,500,000 which has been expended in William Fox's Theatre at Broadway, 165th, 166th streets and St. Nicholas avenue, New York City, which opened to the public on Wednesday, November 27th, is very evident in the tremendous structure which stretches over the entire area of one city block.

In this building besides the theatre proper, which has a seating capacity of 3,300, is a roof garden seating 2,800 people, also a dance hall 112x140 feet. Apart from this there is accommodation for twenty-three stores. The building which is of white brick has a double foyer with tiled floor. Beautiful stained glass panels form a portion of the decoration above the doors leading from foyer to foyer as well as in other parts of the building. When completed the outer foyer will be provided with a room for baby carriages, and the inner one will be comfortably furnished as a lounge.

To really appreciate the beauty of the interior of this theatre one must go there and see it. What impresses you first upon entering the foyer is the soft light in a harmonious blend of amber, rose and green. The woodwork is in oak, the pillars, newel posts and side panels, are of Matto Grosso, Brazil shaque, in variegated shades from cream to terra cotta, which, in its finished condition, has the appearance of polished onyx. The walls are done in a rich deep shade of terra cotta bordering on crimson, the embossed paper having the appearance of heavy brocaded satin. The frescoing is in gold on a pale gray background. On the Newel posts from the chandeliers, and on side brackets, groups of electric bulbs shed soft light through rose green and amber shades.

THE PROSCENIUM ARCH SHOWING ELABORATE PAINTING ABOVE REPRESENTING WASHINGTON ON THE HEIGHTS

SIDE VIEW SHOWING BOXES

The auditorium is similarly decorated. In the rear are long grotto-like corridors, carpeted with crimson velvet into which your feet fairly sink as you walk, and over all, whereever the light strikes, is that predominating shade of rose, which in effect might be likened to the reflection of the rosy dawn or a crimson sunset. It is beautiful.

The stage is immense, 80x55 feet. Stretching from above the proscenium arch far up into the dome is a painting of "Washington on the Heights," which has been placed there at a cost of between one and two thousand dollars. From A to P in the balcony, leaving out I, is occupied with loge boxes, while six proscenium boxes array themselves on either side of the building.

Harry Reichenbach, formerly with Belasco, and also with Henry B. Harris, has charge of the Audubon Theatre, with no less than three assistants which are quite necessary in order to handle the tremendous business of the new Fox Theatre. Eight vaudeville acts and five reels of pictures comprise the daily programme, with a change of pictures every day, and a change of acts Mondays and Thursdays.

We believe we are safe in saying that New York has nothing in the way of a theatre to-day which so satisfies the artistic eye with regard to interior decoration.

"PALACE OF FLAMES"

Itala's new feature film, for which they offered the handsome prize of $25.00, was awarded to Mr. L. R. Harrison, who sent the name which was selected by the judges—"Palace of Flames."

The Star Special Feature Film Company of No. 1-3 Union Square, have bought the State rights for this feature for the territory of New York State, including Greater New York. They are going to great expense to advertise same, having gone to such an extent that they are having a big electric flash made which will cost them in the neighborhood of $300.00. The credit for this sale is due to Mrs. A. Egan Cobb. It is a wonderful piece of work, and will be a big seller.

THE RETURN OF LADY LINDA
(Eclair Two-reel Release)

The Eclair two-reel release for January 9th, entitled "The Return of Lady Linda," is one of special interest. In its artistic production it points to progress in the art of motion picture making. The making of an acceptable picture consists not altogether in the putting over of an interesting story, composition photography, proper and attractive costuming, appropriate setting, and well-chosen exterior locations, are of almost equal value with the story. These details have been so well attended to in the production of "The Return of Lady Linda" that the onlookers marvel at the conception given the theme in its clothing of beauty. Miss Barbara Tennant makes a remarkably charming picture as Lady Linda. The following is a brief synopsis of the story:

"And all things come to him who waits;
But oh! the bitter price!"

The couplet contains the whole theme of this sweetly pathetic old world romance. A film which raises a question of human ethics and sets in motion an entire train of intellectual speculation is rare indeed and should prove a welcome innovation in the present day picture house. If Sir Enrico had not been content to wait . . . ! Man must either master his fate or be mastered by it.

On the eve of her marriage to Claudia, Duke of Rimini, the lovely Lady Linda and Sir Enrico, a penniless baron, whose impoverished estate adjoins the lordly villa whither the lady's father has brought his brilliant train to celebrate his daughter's nuptials, first meet and read each other's eyes. They are surprised in their love-making by the prospective bridegroom and the old Duke Alonzo. Thinking to shame the pauper in the lady's sight, they send him a mock courteous bidding to attend a masked ball at the villa. To their astonishment and chagrin the "Baron of Patches," having secretly pledged his last jewels, appears at the ball arrayed as finely as the best and boldly plays off his gallantries to the lady. A duel is fought in which the baron is unfairly wounded by the outraged Claudio. A few days later Sir Enrico passively sees the woman he loves married to the fraudulently victorious duke.

After an absence of ten years the widowed Linda, Duchess of Rimini, returns to take up her abode in the villa. On the other side of the dividing wall Enrico, poorer than ever, is living in solitude. His establishment is reduced to a solitary servant. His sole and cherished possession is a fawn. One day a little gentleman with golden curls appears in the pauper's garden and boldly announces that he has come to play with the fawn. It is little Pietro, the widowed lady's son. The games continue each day. Each day Enrico's love for the boy increases. Suddenly the visits cease. A week later the Lady Linda presents herself at the baron's gate. The poor gentleman's larder is as empty as his purse. To honor so beloved a guest he makes supreme sacrifice. His treasured fawn dies to make the feast. When the banquet is spread the proud duchess declares her errand. Her child is dying and has begged her to fetch him their neighbor's pet. She has spoken—alas! too late. That night Death enters the villa.

The price of their sinful quiescence paid, the lovers are at last united.

THE UNIVERSAL IN THE HAWAIIAN ISLANDS

The Universal ever to the fore, where something new is concerned, is sending a company of sixteen people to the Hawaiian Islands. They will be gone for at least three months and perhaps longer.

The company will be in charge of Charles E. Inslee who was recently Director Otis Turner's leading man. Mr. Inslee will direct all the pictures taken, and a better man could hardly be picked, for Mr. Inslee has not only directed motion picture plays before, but has been for many years in the business, and has seen all sides of it. He played leads with the Biograph and several other prominent companies.

The company's headquarters will be Honolulu. The pictures will cover an entirely new field, and what an interesting one! Its history abounds in quaint folk-lore and interesting legends.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

Returns the "School" Scripts

THE fame of Giles R. Warren as script writer, editor and director is universal. He has served as editor for many prominent concerns and is now director of the Victor Company. He knows whereof he speaks, and we are pleased to present his views to the readers of this department. Mr. Warren writes:

> The best directors prefer to make out their own working scripts, unless they are so fortunate as to have a scenario editor who thoroughly understands their method of presenting a plot. In my own case but few could lay out a working script to suit me. When I look for a story, I seek merely for the idea and I, personally, prefer a comprehensive synopsis, free from unnecessary detail, and written with a view of continuity of action, to a working script, or commonly called scenarios, laid out in scenes.
> Of course, many authors give additional ideas sometimes, in their scenarios, but it is not necessary for them to do this if the synopsis be tersely but comprehensively written. There is an art in preparing synopsis which many do not seem to possess. The trouble with graduates of "schools," in my experience, is the fact that they have been taught to place too much stress upon the "laying out" of their work, and not to the subject matter itself. Many of them will write: "If this is not laid out technically correct, I want you to tell me, for the 'So-and-So School' guaranteed I can write scenarios to meet with the requirements of any company." I have returned these invariably with the statement that from the standpoint of scenarios, technically speaking, they might do, but as marketable material for picture plays they did not meet with our requirements at all. For the most part they are conventional and the balance lacking in interest. Let anyone give any director a story and it contains the idea, whether written on wrapping paper or otherwise, it will be taken at once. Scenario writing cannot be taught any more than acting or piano playing can be taught. Many people "go on" for parts and still more torture their neighbors by their attempts to coax music from some rosewood upright. It reminds me of a woman who came to me once on behalf of her daughter for whom she was anxious to obtain a position on the stage. After telling me of an amateur performance the girl had appeared in, she finished by saying: "Yes, and she was grand in the part; why, do you know she did not miss one single word, and it was an awfully long part, too!" The idea is the thing in picture play-writing.

In order that there will be no deliberate misconstruction of Mr. Warren's statements, at least, it will be perhaps well to explain his meaning more in detail. The "young hopeful" sits at the piano and plays "Over the Waves" to the edification (?) of a roomful. She is playing the piano. She knows the "rules" and the technique, at a dollar a lesson, but she has no music in her soul. She will never create appealing harmony. The scribe wades through his lessons at a dollar per lesson. He perhaps knows the "rules," or the technique; in other words, he has matriculated as a "scenario writer." However, he has no appealing story, nor has he the talent for evolving original ideas. Or if he has the story-telling talent it has been lost in a maze of "scholarly technique." His work, of course, does not meet with the requirements of any film manufacturing company.

Mr. Warren does not mean to assert that he does not desire correctly written manuscripts. He wishes correctly written scripts, providing the original idea is there. But together with all the other editors and directors, he urges the idea first. The technique is of secondary importance. He refuses "school" scripts, for he knows, just as we know, that no "school" on earth can furnish the talent for originating clever ideas. If the "professor" has an original idea he will market that idea himself Ideas are too valuable to give the pupils. You can study out the technique for yourself considerably cheaper than $10 a "course of lessons." No one can study out ideas for you. That must be an inherent talent and without it you will never become a successful picture playwright.

Another Next Week

Mr. B. P. Schulberg, script editor, will next week give us a strong statement on the "institute" and "school" questions. He also is an authority and his advice to picture playwrights is well worth considering. Watch and wait for it.

The Cleveland News Contest

Recently, the Cleveland Evening News instituted a script-writing contest for Cleveland writers. The plays will be filmed and shown upon the scenes of Cleveland theatres. The prize winners:

First prize—Mary Blanchard, 3725 Carnegie avenue, Cleveland, $50.

Second prize—Edith V. Considine, 6403 Euclid avenue, Cleveland, $25.

Third prize—Dr. Frank A. Dunn, 661 Rose building, Cleveland, $15.

Fourth prize—Miss A. Blossom, 33 Fay street, Cleveland, $10.

Honorable mention—W. H. Schrader, 11327 Hessler road, Cleveland.

The titles of the prize scenarios are:

First—"Yesterday and To-day."

Second—"Mose's Return."

Third—"Mose Shakes Hands with Mr. Socrates and His Two Delightful Friends."

Fourth—"Brought About by Betty."

Honorable mention—"A Sixth City Romance."

Miss Mary Blanchard, 3725 Carnegie avenue, has had two scenarios accepted by the Citagraph Company of America. She will make the work her profession.

Miss Blanchard took up the work last March and has spent practically all her time studying and writing.

"I am encouraged by the winning of a prize in The News contest and the accepting of two of my efforts by the film company and will continue writing," Miss Blanchard said.

Edith V. Considine, 6403 Euclid avenue, stenographer for A. M. Ingerham, 626 Columbia building, writing under the pen name of Virginia Dean, says she will devote much of her time in the future to scenario writing. "I am greatly encouraged by having my scenario awarded a prize by The News," she said. "I have written several scripts and have six out with various manufacturers at the present time."

Dr. Frank A. Dunn, 661 Rose building, has become a writer as a result of having entered The News contest, Dunn has writen special stories for newspapers. He has never made literary work a profession. "I will continue writing scenarios, but will not give up dentistry," Dunn said.

Just So

Mr. James Carroll, Powers prize winner, is getting along just sew, sew. When not writing prize-winning picture plays he takes up the thread of a narrative in the Sewing Machine Times, of New York. James must have pulled hard on that calabash pipe of his before perpetrating this:

Where trembling shadows grotesquely wave, like weeping willows o'er a lonely grave, in a garret where weird shapes are dimly gloomed of outworn household goods entombed. it stands battered, worn and bent, its long and useful life in service spent; once the family joy and pride dismantled now and cast aside; there to rot and rust away, while scampering mice around it play; it bears the mark of baby fingers, o'er it sacred mem'ry lingers, with a scent of days so fair, entwined within its wheels a lock of silvery hair; laughter oft had joined its busy hum, while Death had often made it dumb—beneath the inlaid dust of years are 'graved the marks of bitter tears—it has marked the march of Mendelssohn, and heard the mourner's heartfelt groan; unnumbered stitches has it taken ere for a newer make it was forsaken, and now, in place of costly laces, spider-webs adorn its shattered places, and the moonlight casts a pitying sheen o'er the battered frame of the old machine, and, like it, too, when we are called to Rest, let us hope that we'll have done our best.

IN THE GRIP OF THE VAMPIRE
(Gaumont Three-Reel Production)

The above picture is very splendid in scenic effect, and the story has more than the ordinary number of thrills, not one of the three reels of film utilized in its telling being lacking in the necessary perquisite of interest. It has also one very unique point, Cinematography is represented in this film, for the first time to our knowledge, as an aid to the restoring of sanity. This point carries, no doubt, more than a fictionary truth behind it. The following is a brief synopsis of the story:

By the terms of the will of the Marquis de Rambeau, his niece, Joy, is made heir of his possessions. Count Roderick is appointed her guardian. In the event of Joy's death or her becoming insane, the property reverts to Count Roderick.

Count Roderick receives a note from a creditor, which declares that unless $250,000, which Count Roderick has borrowed upon the chance of his marrying Joy, be immediately paid, the creditor will sue him. The creditor states his unbelief in the ability of the Count to win Joy for his wife, and that the creditor, should he not recover his money, shall at least have done society a service in unmasking a scoundrel.

Desperate, the Count takes Joy for a stroll on the Kador Cliffs on the coast of Brittany, France. He asks her to become his wife. She angrily refuses. In her flight from his embraces, she leaves behind her hand bag. The Count finds in it a letter from Joy's secret fiance, Captain Frank Balladour, of the French navy.

With an insane resolve to obtain possession of the Marquis de Rambeau's property at any cost Count Roderick concocts in his wicked mind a scheme whereby a legal right to it may be obtained. At the same time that he pours a drug into a cup of tea which he gives to Joy, he lures her lover to a place on Kador Cliffs by sending him a note with the forged signature of Joy, where he shoots him with intent to kill. Captain Balladour, the lover, however, revives and goes to look for his sweetheart; finding her senseless on the beach nearby. After hauling her into his boat and setting it afloat in the sea, he too, swoons, and Joy coming to her senses first, goes insane at the sight of what appears to her the dead body of her lover.

For some time she remains thus, baffling all specialists, until finally the Cinematograph method is hit upon. The scene is re-enacted before the camera, and then run off on the screen before the insane girl, with the result that her mind is restored to its normal condition. Count Roderick is surprised while at a masquerade ball and arrested.

The story leaves with the onlooker a feeling of satisfaction in the punishment of the crime.

PANAMA CANAL TO BE SHOWN IN KINEMACOLOR AT CARNEGIE LYCEUM

The Kinemacolor Company of America announce that they have secured Carnegie Lyceum for a period of several months to exhibit their new natural color motion picture series, "The Making of the Panama Canal," which will have its premier presentation in New York on Monday evening, December 30.

The greatest engineering feat of any age will soon be obscured from view by the entry of waters into the canal. Even now much of the waterway has been flooded, but as the Kinemacolor experts have been at work in the Canal Zone making these pictures for a period of many months, they have secured a most comprehensive series of views.

Lawrence Grant, who created much attention while giving a chat explanatory of the Coronation and Durbar series, will speak in connection with this presentation. His knowledge of Panama is extensive, and the spectacular pictures have been much enhanced during the preliminary road tour by his efforts.

The entire history of the canal has been followed. Scenes show the work completed by the old French company under Ferdinand de Lesseps, and carry the spectator through every phase of the great work now so near accomplishment. The operations on Culebra Cut are treated in detail, as are the building of the great locks and dams at Miraflores, Gatun and Mindi.

The wonderful machinery invented specially for the undertaking comes in for its share of attention. Mighty dipper dredges that garner ten tons of rocks and sand at a single scoop, steam shovels doing the work of 500 men at a thrust, and electric drills eating through solid rock as if it were butter, are all shown in the color-pictures. A big hill is blown up in an instant by the explosion of 65 tons of dynamite, and the mountains of concrete, comparable only to the Pyramids, are shown during erection.

Graphically and forcefully the color-films lay bare this wonder of wonders—showing the mighty steam shovels, each of which scoops tons of stone from the giant ditch at one assault, the drilling and dredging of the cut, the hydraulic attacks by which mountain sides are swept away, the gigantic stone crushers, cement mixers, and a multiplicity of novel machinery which man's ingenuity has brought into being for this gigantic undertaking.

No detail of the gigantic work has escaped the Kinemacolor experts, and to witness the exhibition gives a much better idea of the undertaking in its entirety than could be gained by an actual visit to the Canal Zone at Panama. In the color-films you are shown dredges excavating huge masses of earth, suction drills that bore into the soil and automatically remove the earth as it is loosened, the pouring of concrete between the vast guide walls and the blasting away of a mountain in one single explosion. Then there is the construction of the lock gates and, possibly most striking of all, the swinging open of the first gate in the canal. It is not only as the portrayal of a great engineering undertaking from its purely mechanical aspect that these pictures make their appeal; they have possibly a deeper significance in that they record a wonderful feat of human skill and patience, and reproduce at the same time an event of great historic and political importance

The splendid series of pictures are so bewildering in their variety as to baffle description. Reproduced in the actual colors of nature they convey an idea of the infinite magnitude of the undertaking such as no words could realize and leave the spectator amazed and fascinated not by the actual work alone, but in almost equal degree by skill and enterprise shown by the Kinemacolor experts who produced the films.

The greatest engineering feat of any age has been perpetrated for future generations in this series of Kinemacolor—which in its way is as great as the Panama Canal. No verbal description of what has been accomplished could possibly create the profound impression which these pictures by their vividness and perfect coloring produce on the mind of the spectator

"GOING to School at the 'Movies'," is the title of a double-page interview given by Thomas A. Edison to Mary Master Needham, and printed in the Saturday Evening Post of November 30th. The story is one of the most important that we have read in publications other than those devoted to Cinematography. In the copyrighted article, which we urge everyone to read, Mr. Edison says he is planning to do away with textbooks in the schools and proposes to institute the reform through the medium of moving pictures.

"You see, we are planning an eight-year course beginning at the primary grades," Mr. Edison is quoted as saying. "We are going to teach the alphabet by means of moving pictures and I have a half dozen fellows writing scenarios now on A and B.

"It will be about a year before we are ready to put the eight-year course into the schools, and we are going to start right here in Orange, N. J. I have made arrangements with the school authorities and they are going to give us the use of a whole building."

The great wizard goes on to state that every branch of learning, including astronomy, natural philosophy, bacteriology, history, geography, horticulture, everything will be taught by the moving picture, and concludes the interview by saying:

"We'll never get the same results the way we teach now. The world can't stand still. The old way of teaching did all right for the past, but we are in a transition period now. Civilization's pretty raw, yet, pretty crude."

* * * *

We take the liberty of quoting a small portion of The Saturday Evening Post interview because we regard the Edison statements of unusual significance. The entire interview should be read by everyone interested in the advancement of Cinematography and manufacturers, exchange men and exhibitors, really the pioneers in the industry, should feel proud of their connection with the profession. Three years ago, those having the courage to become affiliated with the moving pictures were sometimes compelled to sacrifice social position and some were regarded as mountebanks. All that has changed, and today the exhibitor, scenario writer, and all others having an interest in Filmland's activities can be satisfied in the knowledge that they are engaged in dignified and elevating professions.

Mr. Edison's interview virtually means that within a few short years the entire system of our public school curriculums will be revolutionized. The powers of observation will be brought into play; the pupil will no longer tarry en route to school, but will hasten to the school buildings with pleasurable anticipation; manual training will be a practical not a scholarship theory, and the moving picture courses will extend to higher educational branches. The great universities, medical and dental colleges and scientific seats of learning will adopt the moving picture educational courses to a great extent.

Thomas A. Edison's dreams have been ridiculed in the past and the world gasped in amazement when those dreams became realities. The greatest of all his dreams that of practical education, is the greatest vision of all and will prove one of the most beneficial when made practical, as it is certain to be.

* * * *

The public school systems of our country are in need of rejuvenation. For three months in the year the expensive school houses in most of the cities and towns stand empty and idle. The entire people have been taxed for the erection and up-keep of these structures and have little benefit therefrom. When the moving picture educational courses are universally adopted, everyone can attend school. They will be free to all and men and women, boys and girls, can all be instructed and simultaneously entertained by the pictures. The classes will be universal, something impossible at the present time. The schoolroom will be the gathering place for all. Parents can learn with their children and united interest will help them all. During the summer months the buildings need not be idle, the pictures can continue and so can the classes. The school yards will not be enclosed with iron fences with the gates padlocked. They will naturally develop into public playgrounds and parks. A favorite gathering place for those who love grass and shade.

Then will the public schools of our great country come into their own.

* * * *

Alfred H. Saunders, editor of the Moving Picture News, will read Mr. Edison's assertions with interest and pleasure. Mr. Saunders has been the foremost advocate of the educational uplift of the moving picture. Three years ago he first advocated the idea and was laughed at as an impractical theorist. Time has proved the wisdom of his arguments. He was the first to advocate Cinematography in the public schools, and when that great advancement in world's progress is an accepted fact, he can honestly feel that he has contributed in no small measure toward the revolution by his tongue and pen, just as Thomas A. Edison's genius wil be responsible for the practical working out of the idea.

* * * *

And we would kindly request the editors of popular magazines who are now for the first time discovering the importance of Cinematography, not to refer to a dignified industry as "movies." The vulgar term has been borrowed by the magazines from the daily newspapers, which coined the word because it fitted more easily into headlines. Animated pictures, motion pictures, Cinematography—anything is better than the term "movies," which lacks dignity and flavor of cynicism and ridicule. It lowers the tone of Cinematography and weakens the progress the moving picture is achieving in many walks of life.

* * * *

"The Star of Bethlehem" is a dignified and faithfully enacted picture from the Thanhouser Corporation. It is another valued contribution to the educational side of Filmland. The director who staged it, the actors and actresses who produced the film, and the exhibitors who show it to their patrons are one and all entitled to appreciative thanks. Thanhouser has joined with Kalem and Edison in a good work. There is a fund of educational and entertaining material in the Book of Books, religious denominations, Y. M. C. A.'s and other institutions long for more Biblical pictures of dignified worth. Thanhouser has released such a film in "The Star of Bethlehem."

* * * *

The statement has been made that the Motion Picture Companies have gone through literature with a fine-tooth comb in an effort to get plots. The statement is erroneous. The surface of literature has merely been scratched. There is a wealth of entertaining and instructive material which is readily accessible to the hand of the editor and director, provided they have the literary education to find it. A good library should be an essential adjunct to every well equipped studio. In commenting upon Filmland's ravages upon English literature, "The Photoplay Philosopher" of the Motion Picture Story Magazine, recalls the days when the youngster turned to the "blood-and-thunder" stories of "Deadwood Dick," "Old Cap Collier," "Old Sleuth," etc. He asserts that Lincoln, Seward, Chase, Senator Hoar and others got the dime novel habit early in life and it clung to some of them till their death. This is true. And we add former Senator Beveridge's name to all the rest. Nevertheless, the dime novel days of the long ago are not present days. There is as strong a sentiment through the West and Southwest against the "penny dreadful" as there is against the cigarette. Public libraries bar them and Filmland can struggle along without "Deadwood Dick" and the rest. This fact was convincingly proven some months ago by the Nestor Film Co. There is "blood and thunder" enough on the screen—too much of it. We have noticed with pleasure that certain Western companies are gradually drawing away from the artificial cowboy and the impossible sheriff and are turning to gigantic spectacles of true Western frontier life when the Apaches and Sioux were on the warpath and Uncle Sam's boys guarded the immigrants. Such films are of true historical worth. If boys' novels are deemed essential by manufacturers, we suggest a series of the old-time Harry Castleman, Alger, Oliver Optic, or Mayne Reid books for boys. They are just as exciting in adventure without being written about an opium den or a criminal.

And this: We long to see the day when the advertising slide will be banished forever from the moving picture theatre. Exhibitors should also bar every film that puts over free advertising in the pictures. Patrons resent such practices.

HOCHSTETTER UTILITY PRODUCTION TO SHOW IN LONDON

It has been announced that Geo. Nichols, president of the M. P. Sales Co. of England, has obtained the English rights for the Hochstetter Utility Co.'s splendid production of "The Life of John Bunyan" and "Pilgrim's Progress." The production will have its first English presentation at His Majesty's Theatre, London, at an early date, under the direction of Sir Herbert Beerbohm Tree, who is at present in this country.

The Canadian rights have already been disposed of to Pat Casey, of the Pat Casey Agency, Inc.

This splendid production, which was presented at Carnegie Hall, New York City, with such splendid success on Friday, December 13th, accompanied by the Altschuler Symphony Orchestra, is bound to win laurels for its promoters.

LEON J. RUBINSTEIN, OF THE "NEW ERA MOTION PICTURE PLAN," AND A PROMINENT FIGURE IN THE FILM WORLD

THE GLOOMY OUTLOOK FOR BRITISH PICTURE PLAYWRIGHTS

By Ernest A. Derch

It is not surprising that the British picture playwright has to utilize America and European countries other than his own as a dumping ground for his scripts. For the British market, if it can be termed such, is limited to about four producers who are open to consideration Everybody who can wield a pen apparently dabbles at picture playwriting, and the great majority write solely for the purpose of seeing their own scenario on the screen, so that they can show their envious friends the result of their work.

But those of this clique generally "throw up the sponge" after the first few rejections, instead of pursuing the wise path of persistence.

You can just imagine the strictly confined "ware market" when I tell you that the releases of British films, other than topicals, seldom exceed a solitary dozen weekly.

Yet, on the other hand, American producers are clamoring for more, like the well-known Oliver Twist. The plaint of his British brother is that he gets too many of them. It is curious that the two nations should present such a striking contrast but that is easily accounted for.

Both the British and Colonial and Hepworth companies when returning scripts send out notices, stating that they have sufficient to fill their requirements for many months to come, and desire that no plots be sent to them until they are again prepared to deal with them.

Cricks & Martin and the Clarendon Company are still open to consider some, but they only release four plays weekly between them, while two new producers are in the market for sparkling comedies.

I must say a word of praise for the Clarendon Company, as they are the only producers here that adopt that admirable American plan of sending a printed slip along with each refusal, pointing out their reasons for so doing. The Ecko Film Company just send a brief personal letter. All other producers are content to send out the usual stereotyped notice.

As might be expected, the British scenario writer has no organ to set forth his grievances and so forth, but "The Picture Playwright" department in the The Bioscope worthily fills the long needed want. The writer wrote to The Bioscope several weeks ago, saying that the time was now ripe for the publication of a journal devoted entirely to the interests of picture playwrights, and that America had such a paper; then why not we? I was rather dismayed when the editor replied that I was unduly sanguine, as the number of genuinely interested plot writers is comparatively very small. He then explained that America can support such a journal, because she is so prolific of picture authors. On reflection, this is a thoroughly sound explanation.

It is a mere pittance for the Britisher who desires to make an income out of the uncertain game. He finds that the American field of operation is both a paying and wide one. Hence his consigning the best part of his scripts to the States.

One Mr. Saville, of Ipswich, England, has succeeded in disposing of nearly three hundred picture plays, which I believe constitutes the record for Great Britain. And he has had his plays accepted in every film-producing country, particularly America. He has contracted several bad debts and losses, and his only loss through sending to the States was that one script went down in the Titanic.

Last fall there was an attempt to organize a correspondence school for budding picture playwrights, but luckily for the promoters, they recognized the fallacy of it beforehand, so that the project did not formulate.

The British market at present causes one to get disheartened, and, frankly speaking, is not worth while.

A CHRISTMAS ACCIDENT

By VIRGINIA WEST

(Adapted from Edison Release)

WHEN Gilton and his wife moved into one of the two little houses that stood so close together, everybody said he was a stingy old miser. Why didn't he build a nice residence in the best part of town and help to improve the looks of things? He had lots of money and nobody but himself and wife to support.

This was the general opinion, but nobody told Gilton. He probably would not have cared if they had. He would have told them to mind their own business and gone on his way.

You have probably gathered that Gilton was not the most amiable person in the world to live with. His wife was just what he had made her. Receiving no love and sympathy, she had retired into herself. Not being permitted to express her own love nature, she had grown bitter and narrow and irritable.

People in small places must have something to talk about, so when the Biltons moved into the other little house with their five children, everybody said they didn't see how they could afford it, that the whole town knew that they were terribly poor, and only just able to keep the children in food and clothes.

But the Biltons knew several things that the neighbors and others did not. The house was in very bad condition and because they promised not to ask for any repairs they got a low rent.

Even then it was sometimes hard to get the money together, but the parents looked into each others eyes, and the love they saw there gave them hope to struggle on. For the children must have plenty of room to grow, they said. If they are made strong in mind and body when they are young, they will have received the most valuable inheritance their parents could give them.

So it was that the parents of the Bilton children reasoned, and they worked and lived accordingly.

In this way it happened that the family, so lacking in this world's goods but rich in unseen treasures, came to live so close to the wealthy old Gilton, who squeezed his soul as well as his dollars.

When the old man saw the family moving in, his wife received an extra share of complaints.

"A house full of brats to run all over the place," he stormed. "The whole family are likely thieves. You better keep things locked up."

The wife said that she would.

"What are they doing with a name so much like mine? Only the first letter is different."

"They probably cannot help their name," ventured Mrs. Gilton.

Mr. Gilton looked at her in a way that prevented further remarks on her part.

"Looks queer," he continued. "Anyhow you lock things up."

It was in the spring when the Biltons moved in, and the children were soon working hard to beautify the place as much as possible. There was no yard in front, but behind the two houses was quite a good-sized plot with great possibilities.

The backyard was a never-ending source of pleasure, but it was also the means of bringing about much difficulty.

It is a trifle hard for a child to keep on one side of an imaginary line, and there being no fence between the two yards, that was what the Bilton children were expected to do.

When old Gilton came home in the evening he went to the backyard for signs of trespassing. Usually he found some. A few little footprints, a flower-bed a little over the line, a hair-ribbon or a handkerchief dropped on the wrong side, one of these was sure to be found.

Then there was a great explosion from Mr. Gilton. Apologies were made but were of little use. So usually the old man's rage had to burn itself out, which it never really did.

Gilton would not build a fence and Bilton could not afford to, so matters continued.

Another innocent cause of much trouble was Gilton's dog. He was a fine shepherd and friendly as is characteristic of his kind. Little Cora Cordelia Bilton and the dog were soon fast friends. When she saw him tied on his side of the yard she just couldn t help going over to say good-morning to him and to pat him on his shaggy coat.

The dog, like any sensible dog, didn't like being tied, and he said so in very strong terms. Morning, noon and night, at intervals, he made remarks on the subject. The only time he was really contented was when Cora Cordelia came over to see him.

Now, the Giltons had other neighbors besides the Biltons, and they were not all so fond of the dog—especially his remonstrances. They spoke to Mr. Gilton on the matter, but he told them to mind their own business. So, one morning when Cora Cordelia went out to see her friend, his shaggy tail did not wag nor his bright eyes open wide at her approach. Some one had taken his revenge on the innocent dog for the crime of the unworthy master.

Cora Cordelia was inconsolable. When her father came home she threw herself into his arms, sobbing as though her heart would break. She insisted upon her father going to look at the quiet form of her playfellow, and he did so with a heart almost as heavy as his little girl's.

"See, papa," she said, "he won't look at me any more, and his tail won't wag nor his ears set up. What happened to him?"

"My dear little girl," answered Mr. Bilton, "I am afraid some one did not love him as much as you did. So you see he has gone away."

The child looked at him with wide, tear-stained eyes for a moment before she said, "Did God send an angel for him?"

"Yes, I am sure he did. And now your playfellow can be untied all day long. Won't that be nice."

"Ye—s," acknowledged the little girl.

Just then Mr. Gilton came from his house, "You poisoned my dog!" he cried in a rage. "I'll have you arrested, I will!"

"Do you think I would be here if I were guilty of this disgraceful act?" asked Bilton.

"Yes, you'd be here so that I'd think you didn't do it. I know your kind."

"My little girl loved your dog and she asked me to come to see him."

"Well, you've got no business on my grounds. If your young ones had staid at home they wouldn't know anything about my possessions. That was a fine dog. He cost a hundred dollars and I'm going to have you arrested."

"As you please, sir. If you had thought of the dog more as a living creature than representing a hundred dollars. he probably would not be lying there now," said Mr. Bilton quietly, and turned away.

This happened in the summer. The crusty old man did not say much for a while, but the expression of his face was such that the children ran when they saw him.

In the autumn something occurred which caused matters to break out again.

One Saturday afternoon Mrs. Bilton returned home and found a basket of provisions on her back step.

"Oh, Joe has sent home the things," she said to herself." "What a lot of things he got this week. Well, I'll have his dinner all ready for him when he gets home."

So, straightway the wife cooked a number of the things from the basket. She was awaiting Joe's return when there came a loud knock on the back door.

Who should she find upon opening the door but old man Gilton.

"What have you done with my groceries?" he demanded almost with a roar.

Mrs. Bilton turned pale. "Your—your groceries?" she asked in a trembling voice, the dreadful truth dawning upon her.

"Yes! Where are they? I suppose you think it makes no difference whether I get any dinner."

"Really, sir, I ——"

"Never mind any explaning. Just give them to me."

"But I can't. I've cooked most of them!" Mrs. Bilton managed to get out.

"You've—you've cooked them?"

"Yes. I thought Joe sent them."

"Very likely you did. Very likely indeed. That's a very nice excuse. As though Joe could afford to buy those things."

"That will do, please, Mr. Gilton," said a voice, quiet but tense.

The old man turned and saw Bilton behind him. "I've heard enough to understand the situation. I think," said the young man, "I'll have to ask you to go, Mr. Gilton. I'm very sorry this mistake occurred. Please send me the bill and I shall pay it at once."

Gilton glared but said nothing as he turned and went away.

The bill was paid, but it was not altogether an easy thing to do for the provisions proved to be much more expensive than anything the Biltons would ever have bought.

As Christmas approached the mother and father talked over what they thought they would be able to do for the children. They would be able to give them very little, but they wanted to make that little go as far as possible.

"We might get a few gifts for Santa Claus to bring them and do without the turkey. We can tell them we can't afford a turkey," suggested the mother.

Mr. Bilton agreed that this was the best plan.

The night before Christmas the snow was falling thickly, just as it should on that night. The Bilton family were gathered around the sitting-room table, the children listening with wide eyes to the reading of "The Night Before Christmas."

The father was reading about Donner and Blitzen and the rest of them coming along over the snow, until the children seemed to hear the crunch of their sharp hoofs.

Was it only imagination or was that a real sound? Everybody listened.

Suddenly the door flew open and a snow-covered figure almost fell into the room. Under his arm was a huge turkey, his red head and wattles showing bright against the snow.

"Oh, mother, it is Santy!" cried Cora Cordelia. "He's come to bring us a turkey. Dear, dear Santy Claus!"

The little girl hugged the man round the legs and the tears of joy ran down her cheeks.

"We are glad to see you, Santa Claus," said little Joe, holding out his hand and trying hard to keep the choke out of his voice.

The younger children stood by in awe-struck wonder.

Santa Claus said nothing, but stood as though dazed as he slowly wiped the snow from his eyes.

Mr. Bilton started to speak, but his wife laid a restraining hand upon his arm. "Wait," she whispered. "Wait and see what will happen."

"You are so beautiful, Santa Claus," said Cordelia caressingly. "I love you. I love you almost as much as I do the Christ child. You know about the Christ child, don't you, Santa Claus?"

Santa Claus shook his head rather indefinitely.

"Why the Christ child was born on Christmas. That's why it is called Christmas. He was born in a stable and he didn't have any money or anything, but he loved everybody and was kind to the poor people—and—and—do you know, Santa Claus, you always make me think of the Christ child.

Something that was not snow ran down the cheeks of Santa Claus and his hand hesitatingly found its way to the little girl's head. His other hand reached for the boy.

"Can you forgive me?" he said as he looked at the father and mother. "A light seems to have come to me to-night and shown me what I have been. Forgive me."

"We do, neighbor Gilton," said the father, and the mother repeated, "Indeed we do."

"Children," said the old man, "I am not the real Santa Claus and I came in here only because I was blinded by the snow and got the wrong door, but if you will let me I will take his part to the very best of my power."

And the little ones were content with the substitute.

"JEFF" DOLAN WITH THE STAR SPECIAL FEATURE FILM EXCHANGE

Mr. "Jeff" Dolan, well known in film circles, has accepted the position as chief booking man with the new Star Special Feature Film Exchange, of 20 East Fourteenth Street, New York. This exchange has secured the exclusive New York State rights, including Greater New York, for the $50,000 Itala spectacular feature, "Palace of Flame," which many critics admit to be a greater production than "The Fall of Troy."

HOCHSTETTER PROCESS

Carnegie Hall, Friday, the 13th, was the scene of an exhibition of this process. To a fair audience was shown the "Life and Times of Bunyan," and the "Pilgrim's Progress." The pictures were admirable, and the story very ably staged under the direction of Francis Powers and also well told, especially the acting of Warner Oland in the part of "Christian," which is remarkably true to life. One particular feature of the exhibition was the tinting process which we have been looking forward to witness for a long while, and we can safely say that the films were very beautifully colored, and added a great deal to the effect of the scenes photographed, giving them in a little of their nature beauty.

The process of the Hochstetter Utility Co. is at present a secret, so we do not know whether the toning is done by dyes, or the developing process, but whichever way it is, it certainly gave an additional zest to the story. Added to this, the Russian Symphony Orchestra carried forward the music, which was beautifully adapted to the story and enhanced the value of the exhibition. There should be a great demand among religious institutions for this film, which will, no doubt, be a success wherever it is exhibited.

CHICAGO NOTES

In one of Chicago's finest and largest dancing halls, the Coliseum Annex, on Wednesday evening, December 4th, under the auspices of the Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union, No. 2, of Chicago, there occurred what will long be remembered as one among the very best, most orderly and enjoyable balls which ever took place in that historic edifice.

From President John J. Fanning, Vice-President James W. Sloneker, Secretary-Treasurer Hal Johnstone and Business Manager Arthur G. Allison, down through all of the committees, a more genteel, attentive or enthusiastic body of "Knights of the Crank" never spread themselves to make a large crowd of men and women, old, middle-aged and young, feel perfectly at ease and as "Welcome as the flowers in May," as did the divers committeemen of No. 2 on this memorable occasion.

The Floor Committee consisted of Fred E. Havill, chairman; Lee A. Forbes, Frank A. Murphy, Alfred H. Fales, Albert Friedlander, Curry C. Cull, William H. Lubin, John Bloore, John Funk, William Hassett, Albert Stange, Edward Halliday, Herman Goldberg and James W. Strange.

The make-up of the General Ball Committee was: James W. Sloneker, chairman; Hal Johnstone, secretary; Morey A. Cohen, Frank Spaulding, B. P. White, Frederick E. Havill, Benjamin Hannaberg and Arthur G. Allison.

I am sorry space will not allow of my giving as full an account of this magnificent affair as I would take great pride in doing, but I will say that each of the committees and officers did their full duty, and then some, to materially aid in the grand triumph achieved. There were wide-awake committees on Music, Theatre Publicity, Program and General Pbulicity, Hall, Floor, Amusement, Lighting, Refreshment, Finance, Check Room. Beside those two hustling trustees, B. P. White and Joe Friend, there still remained that up-to-the-closing-time guardians, the three Board of Trustee members, F. E. Havill, M. H. Cohen and Harry Warmboldt.

The International President of the I. A., Charles C. Shay, of New York, led one column of the grand march; International Secretary-Treasurer Lee M. Hart led another column; John J. Fanning, Local President, and James W. Sloneker, Local Vice-President, let the two other of the four columns. A mammoth flashlight photo was taken of the four grand march columns.

The Cleveland Motion Picture Exhibitors' League is going to give a ball on January 14th at the new Statler Hotel. The ballroom of this hotel is capacious enough to accommodate 1,200 people. The committee in charge has notified the business men that there will not be anyone commissioned to take advertisements for a "souvenir program" for this ball, and anyone attempting to do so must be looked upon as a fraud. Bravo! At last a little peace. The local league will have in attendance, by invitation, many of the picture play stars, who are to be the guests of the league and who will be given every attention due, free from any expense to the guests.

I mentioned in my last that a movement should be started in the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America looking to the regulation of the number of films to be run at a performance at different classes of show houses. In talking the subject over with some of the officers of Chicago Operators' Union No. 2, this week, I was agreeably surprised to learn that that organization was on the verge of starting that very reform at its next regular meeting, next Thursday morning at 10:30.

The idea of the officers of No. 2 is to appoint a committee of their organization to meet a similar committee from the Exhibitors' League, and the two committees come to a mutual understanding regarding this vexed question. It is the concensus of opinion that a graduated scale should be evolved and placed in the constitution of the two organizations, telling exactly how many reels will be given by a union operator for each performance at the same time taking care of all "Special" or larger runs and privileges to be allowed exhibitors when circumstances warranted.

Of course, the two committees having been given power to act, both parties to the understanding will be fully protected, and, I am happy to state, bring the two organizations nearer to that point of brotherly intercourse which is essential to the perpetuity of them both. One good, level head in each committee can accomplish wonders toward this happy and much desired end, and I hope both bodies will use much care in selecting the men to place on this sure-to-be-history-making conference committee, in whose hands will be placed the power to pleasantly anneal or viciously and irreparably dissever the two vital parts comprising the very life of the picture exhibiting art throughout the United States. From the viewpoint of this end of the line, it is the duty of this committee, once in session, never to adjourn until this most vital of all vital questions that can possibly face these two honorable organizations is thoroughly understood and settled, AND SETTLED RIGHT! Do it now, and all will be roseate for our noble industry.

Mr. Ewing Mitchell, a worthy member of Operators No. 2, has signed up for the season with the Paul J. Rainey & Co.'s African Lion and Wild Animal Exhibition, one of the largest regular road shows out of Chicago. The first stop will be Omaha, Neb., and the season will not end till July 1, 1913. Mr. Mitchell is one of No. 2's finished operators, and the Rainey company is to be complimented in securing the services of a man of his mechanical calibre.

* * * *

For the protection of the exhibitor and the operator, mutually, the new identification card of No. 2 is certainly just the thing. It is printed in duplicate, and has the photograph of the operator it is issued to attached, one being kept on file in the City Examiner's office and the other carried by the operator, to be shown to the managing exhibitor where the operator may be employed. This is an infallible protector to all concerned—the visiting inspector, the proprietor, and, best of all, the patronizing public.

* * * *

On account of straightening up the multitudinous things left over from the grand ball given by No. 2 last week, there will be no regular meeting of that local for this week, but a regular meeting will be held next Thursday at the usual hall, Masonic Temple, at 10:30 o'clock.

"I can tell you the reason of the delay and the postponed meeting," said one enthusiastic member; "its because those three hustlers of our union, Hal Johnstone, secretary; John J. Fanning, president, and Arthur G. Allison, business manager, who can't be beat in their separate lines of work, never saw so much dough in all their lives. Why, they are not all through counting the cash we made at that ball yet, and Hal is wearing corn plasters on all his fingers, now, and one thumb. And as for Fanning and Allison, they just sit and look sympathetically at each other, with their hands in their pockets." After heaving a sigh, he groaned, "This high financing is certainly wearing on the nerves—and fingers!"

Mr. George Henry has two theatres, one on Twelfth street and Boulevard, and the other at Eighteenth and Halsted streets, and the patronage seems to be as regular as clockwork in volume and enthusiasm. There is more than one cause for this, but it is mainly attributable to a well-managed operating booth and machine, good lens and attention to focusing and adjustment of carbons. Of course, a good curtain is usually essential, but here is a rare exception: At the Halsted street house, where vaudeville is run on Sundays and holidays, the muslin used for the film display is a common drop white curtain, which is rolled up to allow the vaudeville stunts to be pulled off and dropped down for the moving pictures. This necessarily causes more or less wrinkles in the curtain. But, strange as it may seem to the reglar theatre-goer, these wrinkles do not show when the picture is on, and the display is much above the average Possibly Brother Henry will divulge this secret to the Moving Picture News readers later on.

NOTES BY THE WAY

The Bicycle Squad

In Jacksonville, Fla., there is what has come to be known as the "bicycle squad." The boys who own wheels scoot from theatre to theatre and scan the posters with all the air of dramatic critics, and upon the outside display depends which show they will attend. Those theatres with a preponderance of Western subjects usually get the patronage of the members of the "bicycle squad."

Film Man a Crack Swimmer

W. C. Burgert, of the Tampa Photo and Art Supply Company of Tampa, is the pioneer film man of Florida, having been the first to exhibit moving pictures in that state. He is also a crack swimmer, and is just aching for some "water dog" to come along to try him for the championship that he claims. In a recent contest in Tampa Bay "Billy" made the distance of nine miles in five hours and eleven minutes. Open for all comers.

An Odd Ordinance

A Jacksonville ordinance provides that on Sundays all theatres, moving picture or otherwise, shall be closed from 6:30 to 8:30 p.m. The picture shows start at two o'clock, and in accordance with the above requirement, have to close durig the two hours named, and then open again. It is understood that the ordinance was enacted in deference to the church-going people. If so, and it was calculated to bring people to church during the two hours of closing, it has missed its mark. And as far as conducing to a quiet, orderly observance of the day is concerned, it does not do it. One has only to see the great crowds surrounding the theatres on Sunday evnings before the opening of the doors at 8:30 o'clock to be convinced that the ordinance has failed of its purpose. To a stranger the sight of the crowds at that time gives him the impression of the gathering of the great throngs that congregate about a circus before the opening of the doors, and makes him feel that such gatherings, though quiet and orderly, are not calculated to contribute toward the proper observance of the Sabbath. Surely it is a strange ordinance, and should be amended so as to either close the theatres altogether on Sunday or allow them to remain open during the entire period after 2 p. m.

Some Former Film Rental Prices

Those exhibitors who are disposed to complain of the prices asked nowadays for film service, should find consolation in knowing that no matter what they are paying now, they are bargain prices compared with what the exhibitors had to pay in the earlier days of the business, say along about 1904-6, when the following prices prevailed:

One reel changed once a week	$25.00
One reel changed twice a week	30.00
One reel changed three times a week	35.00
Two reels changed twice a week	40.00
Two reels changed three times a week	50.00
One reel (absolutely first run) changed six times a week	120.00

Not much regard was paid to the "age" of films at that time, so, taking the average cost of a reel at $100, an exhibitor to-day, paying from $25 to $60 a week for eighteen reels, gets the benefit of an investment of $1,800 by the exchange as against an investment of one or two hundred dollars a few years ago. Exhibitors, therefore, in kicking against the "high cost of living" or of doing business, should not include the rental prices of film. The fact is, the exhibitor of to-day is living in clover compared with the showman of that time. Then the date of the releases was kept from him as much as possible both by the maker and the exchange man, and such a thing as a poster was a wild and visionary idea. While to suggest a daily change of a two or three-reel show was to make the suggester the subject of a careful examination as to his mental equilibrium, as the releases all told only numbered about ten to fourteen a week. A little "looking backward" by the exhibitor of to-day should have the tendency to make him a little more appreciative of the advantages he enjoys over those that were possessed by the pioneers of the "show shop."

Opera Chairs for Amusement Halls

(From Consul S. M. Taylor, Nottingham, England

There are no firms in Nottingham acting as agents for theatre chairs, but for this purpose American firms might correspond with the furniture dealers whose names and addresses are obtainable from the Bureau of Manufactures. I have made inquiries as to the opportunities for such chairs, and the situation appears to be:

As soon as moving pictures began to be housed in theatres of their own, firms for the manufacture of their furnishings were established. There are now about a dozen of these, situated in London, Liverpool, Manchester and Birmingham. When a new picture theatre is decided upon, the architect or builder writes for estimates to the several firms, and naturally selects the lowest bid. Competition is very keen and prices are cut to a fine point.

An indication of British prices, which may be of value in estimating conditions of the local trade, follows: Folding birch chair, 95 cents each; garden or exhibition chair, folding iron frame, varnished lath seat and back, 54 cents each; seats or chairs to be attached to floor in rows, 15-inch centres, 12½ inches deep, solid wood stained any color, polished backs 5½ inches, painted iron standards, 95 cents each; same, with seat and back with upholstered centre, finished banding and brass studs, covered American leather cloth, $1.21 each; seats or chairs to be attached to floor in rows, 16 to 18 inch centres, 5-inch stuff-over back, seat 14 inches deep, well upholstered, 3 to 5 inches thick, covered in good quality Utrecht velvet or railway rep, $1.82 each.

The best method of reaching the local trade is to deal through a wholesale distributing agency in London, Liverpool, or Manchester, which would act as a centre for the British trade generally. I am very doubtful whether it would be found profitable to establish an agency in this city, as the amount of business to be done here in the future is likely to be limited, the community being already well supplied and almost oversupplied with moving picture shows.

(From Consul General John L. Griffiths, London,

British Prices Low

Prices of British-made theatre chairs are very low, and when the seating of a hall is installed under contract prices in the aggregate rule slightly lower. It is thought that the public generally prefers upholstered or leather (usually imitation) covered chairs, and that steel chairs would not be popular. So far as cinematograph theatres and ordinary theatres and halls are concerned, it would appear that the present local demand is fully supplied; in fact, in many districts they are already so numerous that the margin of profit is frequently at a minimum, and, being already fitted, the introduction of new chairs in place of those already in use would not commend itself to the owners.

By ERNST LUZ

Who is at fault in allowing the idea to spread that picture playing calls only for the most menial of musical requirements? Two recent experiences of mine have giving birth to the above question. In a discussion of certain picture music with a well-known orchestra leader, which picture is to be produced under his direction, he remarked: "Well! I think a great deal more of it now; I originally thought it was only a moving picture." Unconsciously, while meaning to pay a compliment, he very forcibly expressed his opinion of picture music as it is, yet in less than 20 minutes' time he was so enthused with an orchestra score of picture music, that he exacted the promise of having the score given to him at once so as to be able to bring it out creditably. I recite this incident, as it does contain thought for all who are interested in the moving picture. It should interest the player to know that there are movements afoot for better picture music, and, unless he improves himself, he will find himself even less thought of than now, for while in certain quarters we will continue to have inferior picture music, still the addition of good music to pictures will create a greater contrast, and the inferior player will be the recipient of even more harsh criticism. Again the same incident conclusively convinced me that the well-known and professional musician is only too willing to give his talent to picture playing and picture music, when he is furnished with that which is necessary for him to have, so as to make good music possible. Wherever you go it is always the same, for the word "only" is in constant use as a prefix to picture player. A few days ago a pianist was called upon to play for a singer, singing three popular rag and topical songs, all well known, and partly declined to do so, excusing himself by saying he was "only" a picture player. After some encouragement he consented, and the most peculiar part of it all was that he did admirably well. As long as the exhibitor places the stamp of picture player upon his musician this sentiment will exist and the exhibitor will suffer. To be able to perform upon a musical instrument requires an extended amount of study, and I am not sure that picture playing requires decidedly less study than the mastering of the instrument.

It might be well for the exhibitor to first employ the musician, for if competent he will have little difficulty in entertaining, and in a very short time be able to master the pictures.

Again, when features are shown to which music has been especially arranged, demand that it be played, regardless of the criticism, for it would truly be a poor arrangement that would not convey one or more new ideas for picture playing, and the ultimate result would be better music in a short time, and in most cases, no change of musicians would be required, for it must be remembered that the highest proficiency of the professional musician is attained only after he has had experience in playing an extensive repertoire of music.

If the fault lies with the musician, it is, as a rule, caused by his indifference, unless he is not competent, in which case I do not class him as a musician.

To those indifferent I would say that were they to study the good picture, of which there are many at present, with a view to musical inspiration, they would find a pleasure in their vocation of picture playing, and did their ambition so dictate, they would find interest in the reading and study of musical literature which would not only be interesting but educational as well. Speaking from personal experience I can truthfully say that while having been familiar with Hector Berlioz's work on instrumentation for years, I never realized the full value of that portion under the heading of "Expressive Character of Instruments" until I went through a state of picture inspiration. After having played vaudeville and grand opera, military band and orchestra for all known functions for the past 20 years, I can truthfully say that none afford the opportunity to musically educate and advance yourself as does the good picture, especially when the story is based on a classic. It is true that the work is laborious, but it will be so only until better music is in vogue, whereupon it will be classed as it deserves and the good musician will receive consideration.

The following plot of "Brutality," Biograph release of December 2nd, is set to give those so desiring an example of the working out dramatically of a climax which is certainly excellent in the picture. The picture being based on a concentrated moral thought forcibly suggests a musical tone.

Set-Up.

1. Waltz.
2. Dramatic Mysterioso.
3. Waltz. Same as No. 1.
4. Lively 6/8.
5. Caprice.
6. Dramatic Mysterioso.
7. Waltz.
8. Heavy entrance Dram.
9. Hurry. (Light)
10. Plaintive. (Dram.)
11. Slow Legato Waltz.

Cues.

Play 1 until leader "The brutality in him asserts itself."
Play 2 until after brutal action.
Play 3 until leader "After the wedding."
Play 4 until young husband comes from saloon intoxicated.
Play 5 until young husband enters home after quarrel. Exterior. (Tone.)
Play 6 until leader "Tickets for the show."
Play 7 until Fagin on in Oliver Twist act.
Play 8 until Sykes threateningly addresses Nancy.
Play 9 until after struggle.
Play 10 until young husband rises from theatre seat.
Play 11 until end.

The first six numbers are descriptive and should be melodious. The dramatic mysteriosos are given for the purpose of accentuating the "Brutality" which is the formation of the entire picture, not necessarily dramatic, and could be toned, too, but by so doing much of the necessary effect would be lost. The entire picture centers itself upon the act of Oliver Twist which, when musically worked out, is very effective. Heavy entrance music is very simple and yet very effective and can be used at all times when what is known as the heavy character (or villain) enters or is on screen immediately preceding dramatic violent action, at which point it is more necessary and effective.

Heavy entrance music is always more effective when using a progression of what is known as the diminished seventh chord in unison (both hands playing same tone octave apart). To locate the diminished chord of the seventh take your dominant or primary chord of the seventh in the key of C, which is G B D F, then diminish it by raising your fundamental G one-half tone to G♯; you will then have G♯ B D and F, or a diminished chord of the seventh. Raise all these tones one-half step and you will have A C D♯ and F♯, making another chord of the diminished seventh. Lower the first chord, G♯ B D and F, one-half step and you have G, B♭, D♭ and E, which is another chord of the diminished seventh. You will then have all the tones comprising the diminished seventh chords, for in continuing up or down one-half step you will find you have the same tones, only in inverted form or set differently.

By playing the separate tones of this chord with two grace notes accentuating each tone very slowly in downward progression and then double your time and play the same tones without the grace notes in upward progression for two octaves and then doing the same with chord one-half tone lower and so on until end of action, you will have as good a heavy entrance number as is required.

Follow such a heavy entrance number with a light hurry toning at struggle, then taking on a decided plaintive number in minor key until the young husband rises in his theatre seat, then going into a slow legato waltz movement until end, will give an appreciative climax to a picture which I call excellent and inspiring. Study out this diminished seventh as suggested and you will have a good and simple dramatic number which can often be used when a mysterioso is suggested.

Unavoidable circumstances have made it impossible for me to give my usual plots this week, but they will again appear next week.

OPERATORS' CHAT

By Ralph Knaster

MOVING PICTURE MACHINE OPERATORS' UNION No. 1 OF NEW YORK

President—Robert Goldblatt.
Vice-President—James Daisie.
Recording Secretary—George Epstein.
Financial Secretary—Robert Levy.
Sergeant-at-Arms—Ed. Spinola.
Business Representative—Ralph Knaster.

Telephone—Stuyvesant 572.
Office—133 Third Avenue.

In the chat column of a recent issue the writer gave a little advice to the operators about signing receipts or books for receiving full-scale wages and are satisfied with accepting from three to four dollars less, as they are threatened with dismissal if they should make reports to tbeir local. The men that accept salaries that way are truly slaves that can be bought and sold for a mere threat, and where is the brave spirit of men of such calibre, and how would this great country, the United States of America, be if the men that demanded independence in the days of '76 would have fled from the battlefield on account of a little threat by the British general?

The writer again advises all operators to look after their own welfare in regard to the scale of wages and demand full compensation for their labor. If, however, they feel that they can spare a little from that salary, don't forget that the sun does not shine every day, and should they desire to give some donation there are many institutions that will accept that and would do more charitable deeds for the needy ones that are well deserving of it, instead of doing charity to bosses that make a practice of enriching themselves from the sweat of the workingman's brow, and who are really guilty of blackmail, for when a boss compels you to sign a receipt for more than he gives you, under a threat, he actually compels you to give him those three or four dollars which you have earned without giving you anything in return, and under the law if one succeeds in getting your money through a threat, be it dismissal or any other threat, it is pure blackmail, and such men can be prosecuted and also sent to prison.

Now, fellow craftsmen, if you have such cases existing and you belong to the M. P. M. Operators Union No. 1 do not fear for your position but make such cases public, as you are under the protection of the law of tbe land and of the laws which you help to make through your representatives. You are also protected by the organization of wbich you are a member, and if you will bring these facts to the attention of the business representative of your local he will take up all cases and, if necessary, prosecute those who are responsible for such acts to the full extent of the law.

To the members of the Spot Light Union No. 35, or their department, there are many poor comments to make. A union is really an organization to better conditions of the workingman, but some of them are organizations for the benefit of the bosses' pockets. Such is Spot Light Union No. 35 and its department. The M. P. M. Operators Union No. 1 always protects the members and sees to it that the regular scale of wages is paid to them. The members of Spot Light Local No. 35 offer themselves for less money so as to get work and in this way better the condition of the exhibitors' bank roll. If an operator wishes to do this he does not need any labor organization which is that in name only. If you want to work for less than another man, why give your money to an organization? You can get all the work you want in tbat fashion and more in another fashion without an organization.

Theodore Ridder, a member of Local No. 1, was working at the Venice Theatre, 689 Amsterdam Avenue, between Ninety-third and Ninety-fourth streets, and was receiving $23.50 per week. A member of Spot Light Local No. 35, Alex Vasselinoe, offered to work for less money and consequently got the job. Another case in Flushing, L. I. Mr. Victor, the proprietor of the Flushing Hippodrome, employed Morris Wolheim, a member of M. P. M. O. U. No. 1, paying him full scale, and Monday a member of No. 35 took the job for less money, as the boss wanted to cut expenses. Tbe pianist who was working there also laid off and another one went to work for $4.00 less. This proves that when a boss can cut the salary of one employee he will certainly do the same to the rest, and so the conditions of the boss are better and tbe conditions of the working men are made worse, by a so-called labor organization, which is responsible for such conditions by not reprimanding the members for such contemptible tactics.

OUR QUESTION BOX

By R. J. Kay

Mr. R. J. Kay:

Dear Sir—Why is it that my carbons always pencil? Am working on A. C. and have changed my brand three times but without success. Kindly advise me what to do. Am using ⅝ in. soft cored.
PHILIP L.

Philip L.:

Try using ¾-in. carbons on the bottom and I think you will find your trouble ended, as you must be working on a high amperage.

* * * *

Had some trouble witb my lamp this week, that is, it bounded up on me and I put some oil on the burner and it worked fine for a few minutes, but it bounded up again worse than before; put some more oil on it and it acted the same way. HENRY J. H.

Take out your burner and clean off all of the oil that you put on and then put some graphite on it, as the oil carbonizes.

* * * *

Editor of the Question Box:

Am using an old two-pin Edison machine and would like to know if I could have it changed into a one pin as the frame and stand are in first-class condition, also how much would it cost if it could be done. U. R.

U. R.:

You can have your machine changed into a one-pin movement at any first-class moving picture repair shop and they will give you a figure on what it will cost.

* * * *

Mr. Kay:

I am working on Powers No. 6 machine and would like to attach a motor. Can you advise me how to go about it, and where can I find a union machinist? M. L., New York City.

In answer to your query I would suggest that you take the head of your machine to a competent machine shop having expert experience in this line. If you desire to have me mention a union machinist, I only know of two in New York City that belong to the operators union and they are well experienced. One of these is the Emergency Machine Repair Co., 210 E. 14th street, and the other one is LeRoys Acme Machine Shop, of 133 Third avenue. If there are others, I do not know of them.

* * * *

Dear Mr. Kay:

I am working on a standard machine motor drive and when an empty reel is placed in the lower magazine and start my motor the take-up works. But when the film is in it won't take up. What can I do? A. C.

To A. C.:

Your tension is too tight, and when the film is not in the machine your motor has just enough power to work your take-up, but when the film is in the machine the motor has not got enough strength to work the machine and take up as your tension is too tight. If you will loosen it up slightly your trouble will no longer prevail.

* * * *

Mr. R. J. Kay:

I would like to know what I can do with my picture lense. I took the lense out to clean it and there are a few slight scratches. How can I get the scratches out? W. S., Cincinnati, Ohio.

There are certain places in this city and no doubt there are some in your city where you can have your lenses ground down and polished, eliminating the scratches.

* * * *

To Editor of Question Box, M. P. News:

In the place I am working, we have trouble with the pictures out of focus on one side. Will you kindly advise men what to do, as I changed lenses and have the same trouble? J. B.

To J. B.:

No doubt your machine is set at an angle which will cause such trouble, and if you will get a special lense for the angle you have you will get good results on the screen. I would advise you if it is possible to centre your machine with the screen; tbat would give you also good results with the same lense you are using at present. Another trouble may be tbat the aperture plate may not be set true with the lense and causes one side of the film to be closer to the lense than the other, therefore sharper on one side.

* * * *

Dear Mr. Kay:

I have a whole lot of trouble witb my pictures and my manager and boss are kicking, and threaten to discharge me, which I can ill afford, as I am a married man with a family. I have examined everything very carefully and even braced my machine so that it would take an earthquake to budge it. Hoping that you will give this your earliest attention, as it means bread and butter to me, I remain D. H.

Answer to D. H.:

If you will look over your interment sprocket I think that you will find that the teeth are worn off pretty badly, and advise you to attend to same at once.

INNOVATIVE

Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Especially for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City

On November 4th last the Supreme Court of the United States promulgated its Revised Rules of Practice for the Courts of Equity. These will go into effect February 1, 1913 and remove the chief grounds for criticism of the existing patent law system without the necessity of any amendment of the law. They provide for the taking of testimony in open court under the immediate supervision of a judge, thus eliminating the intolerable delays and prohibitive expense possible under the old practice of taking testimony before an examiner with no power to control the length or prolixity of testimony, always detrimental to the interests of the weaker (financially) litigant; they revise and regulate the practice as relates to expert testimony in patent and trade-mark cases,—a much needed reform; they prevent procrastination, and in fact stamp out the common devices by which patent litigation has heretofore been made burdensome and questionable. Furthermore they blaze the way for similar changes in practice before the Patent office itself, without Congressional action. Finally these new rules, in conjunction with recent decisions of the Supreme Court, fully illustrate the futility of seeking, by fundamental changes in the patent system, and radical abridgment of the rights of patent owners, to accomplish reforms which can so easily be effected without resort to legislation.

This confirms the concensus of opinion expressed by witnesses before the House Committee on Patents that the Patent Laws of the United States, so far as they define the rights of patent owners, are fundamentally sound, and that all the imperfections which have been imputed to the patent law can be traced to matters of practice and procedure.

As an illustration of the general and practical interest that is manifested in the subject we subjoin herewith resolutions adopted by the Board of Directors of the American Institution of Electrical Engineers, passed November 8, 1912, to wit:

WHEREAS, There are pending before the Congress numerous bills affecting and greatly modifying the Patent System in the United States, and

WHEREAS, The Patent System has been, and is, a tremendous factor in building up present industrial prosperity of this country, thereby greatly contributing to the prosperity of the country as a whole, and

WHEREAS, Any untoward change in the patent situation might disastrously affect this condition of industrial and general prosperity, and the conditions contributing to their continual augmentation, and

WHEREAS, In view of the intimate relation of the Patent System to the general welfare, no action looking toward any radical change in the Patent System should be taken without most careful consideration, and

WHEREAS, In our opinion, proper consideration of such important changes as are proposed can be had only by an unbiased, non-partisan commission, made up of men from various walks of life and not from any one vocation, or interest.

BE IT RESOLVED, That the American Institute of Electrical Engineers, acting through its Officers and Board of Directors, respectfully urge the Congress of the United States that they provide for a Commission, made up of unbiased, independent, non-partisan men of such national standing as will command the respect of the whole country; and chosen from different walks of life; and not more than one from any one calling or interest; and serving without pay. Such Commission to hold hearings, and otherwise, as may appear to them best, to make a thorough and careful study of the American Patent situation, and to prepare and submit a comprehensive report and recommendations to Congress for such changes, if any, as may, as the result of their study, appear to them expedient, whether in the Patent Office, in the method of Court procedure, or in the organic Patent Law, and recommendations as to the Legislation they would propose for effecting said changes. And that we further respectfully urge that the Congress make ample provision for the Expenses of said Commission, and

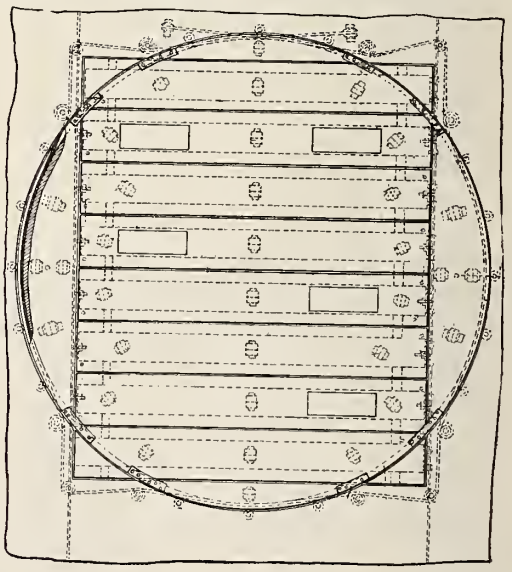
BE IT RESOLVED, That we respectfully urge the Congress of the United States to hold in abeyance all proposed Legislation affecting the Patent System in whatsoever way until such time as the said Commission shall have had ample opportunity to hold the said hearings, and make the said study and report, and

BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED, That these resolutions be printed and a copy be sent to each Senator and Representative of the United States who is a member of the Senate or House Committee on Patents.

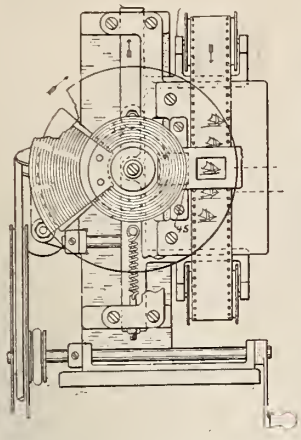
This is an example that might well be followed by other scientific and industrial organizations of competent jurisdiction.

It is now up to the U. S. Supreme Court, in suit against the Seymour Packing Co., of New Jersey, to decide just what constitutes a rotten egg. Would it were possible to have said Court differentiate between good and bad films—some of the latter evidently having emanated from the state of Denmark.

Patent No. 1,045,398 issued to Claude L. Hagan, of New York City, is for improvements in theatrical stages, the object of the invention being, not only to construct a stage which as a whole may be rotated, but to provide one of a number of sections, which may be united on the plane of the stage floor and rotated, or individual sections or groups thereof may be lowered, moved forward or backward on the plane of the stage floor or below it, one section taking the place of another as desired. The sections may follow each other into position like the sections of an endless conveyer, yet they are free to rotate on the stage floor and to change relative positions. In short the object is to provide a sectional rotatable stage wherein any section may be moved into any part of the rotatable whole. By this means a scene may be set on each one of the four quarters of the stage, or on any other division, and the stage rotated to present the new scene to the audience a moment or two after lowering the curtain, and the stage hands may remove the rear scene and reset the same during the act which is going on on the front section. The vertically movable rectangular stage sections may be lowered on their cradles to provide "sinks." Or before the play two scenes may be set. After the first scene is acted and curtain lowered, the stage is rotated to present the second scene to the audience. During the playing of the second scene the rear section may be lowered with the first scene thereon, the scenery removed and a new scene set, and so on, the possible combinations being numerous.



LEGAL PROPOSITION:
Wiedner versus Hell.
26 Southwestern Reporter 781.
Plaintiff has evidently been roasted. Wants to Wiedner breach.



Patent No. 1,045,905, issued to Charles B. Stilwell, of Wayne, Penna., for Improvements in Kinetoscopes, designed primarily to provide a simple apparatus that will exhibit moving pictures faithfully, with clearer definition and without the objectionable flickering that results from the usual mode of interruption of the travel of the film sections during the projections of the successive scenes thereon, without the usual periodic obstruction of the projection of the light rays upon or the illumination of the screen, and without the vibration of the apparatus consequent upon the character of the usual movement. Hence the inventor has devised means whereby, first, the successive scenes to be exhibited rest in the optical axis of the apparatus during the periods desired for projecting them while the film travels though the apparatus at a constant rate, without the formation of the usual slack or "loop" and the use of the usual jerking step by step movement given to the scene section to secure periods of rest of a portion of an otherwise constantly moving film; second, whereby the light is cut off from the film during the periods of transition of scenes with respect to the optical axis without obstruction or periodically interrupting the projection of light through the apparatus and the illumination of the screen, and, third, whereby the movements of all parts of the apparatus are regular and smooth by reason of the avoidance of the usual intermittent movements. By means of a cam the film and film rollers during exposure are raised or carried backward at the same speed as that of the continuous feed of the film so that relatively a picture is stationary with relation to the optical axis, the cam then allowing a drop to the succeeding picture, during which drop the light is shunted around the film and through the objective onto the screen.

We shall be pleased to answer pertinent questions propounded by readers of the Moving Picture News.

Sparrow versus Hawkes (2 E. R., 505) would seem a bird of a lawsuit, in which the innate pugnacity of the plaintiff has overcome discretion, since ordinarily a single hawk seeks to pre-empt a plurality of sparrows, whereas in the present case we have a single sparrow attacking a plurality of its natural enemy

Sigmond M. Rasin, of Philadelphia, Pa., has applied for registration of "ROTOGRAPH" as a trade-mark for Sensitized Photographic Papers claiming use since October 10 1910.

Patent No. 1 045,731, to Sidney Scrivener Napper, of Coventry, England, assignor to Samuel Courtauld & Company, Limited, of London, England, relates to the manufacture of threads, filaments, strips, or films of cellulose, and particularly to the so-called setting baths in which cellulose hydrate is regenerated. Such baths consisting, for example, of dilute sulphuric acid alone, or with additional ingredients, for instance (severally or jointly), salts of sulphuric acid, glucose and the like. The invention consists in adding to such a fixing bath a small quantity of zinc, preferably zinc sulphate, or of zinc, or a zinc compound, which by the action of the acid in the bath, will be converted into a zinc salt, and in the use of such a bath for the regeneration of cellulose hydrate from viscose.

Registration has been granted the Societe Francaise des Films et Cinematographs Eclair, New York City, for the trade-mark "SCIENTIA" for moving picture films, used since May 1, 1912.

GOVERNMENT BILL IN QUEBEC PROVIDES FOR APPOINTMENT OF CENSOR BOARD

The following from the Montreal Herald suggests to us that our neighbors across the northern boundary are not asleep:

"After May, patrons of the 'movies' in the province of Quebec will be safeguarded by a special censorship. The government bill, providing for the appointment of a board of three censors has been prepared.

The new commission will have powers along the same line as those of the Ontario prototype. Every film that passes inspection must show a certificate bearing the facsimile signature of the president or acting president of the commission. The penalty for violation will be a fine of not less than $30 and not more than $200, with the alternative of two months' imprisonment.

New license regulations, included in the bill, stipulate that motion picture shows in Montreal and Quebec shall pay twenty cents per seat, while in smaller towns the tax will be fifteen cents only."

THE MOVING PICTURE COLONY AT LOS ANGELES CAL.

The Los Angeles, Cal., Express, of November 30, gives the following interesting account of the rapid growth of the moving picture colony in that vicinity:

With twenty-five motion picture companies already on the ground, Los Angeles and vicinity has augmented its screen colony by the arrival of four more assemblages.

The Rex has sent two companies to enjoy permanent picture weather, while the Eclair also is represented by a goodly aggregation. The three companies are housed at the Gower street studio of the Universal.

Stanner S. Taylor, manager of the Monopole Company, a big feature concern, also came in from New York yesterday, accompanied by his wife, who is known to screen fame as Marion Leonard. Both formerly were with the Biograph. Miss Leonard has been seen with two other companies since. Mr. Taylor is searching for a location.

The Universal camp at Oak Crest, has two additional directors, who came on the same train with the others.

Tuesday next is to be Universal day in San Francisco valley. It is reported that Governor Johnson and other state officials, together with Mayor Alexander, city officials, chamber of commerce members and representatives of other civic bodies, have accepted the invitation to be guests.

They will be shown about the valley, and also the inside workings of the mammoth film plant, where 400 actors, 45 Indians, 50 cowboys, 50 cavalrymen and 12 directors are located.

GAUMONT

THE MAN WITH THE PULL (Dec. 26).—Calino and his excruciatingly beautiful sweetheart coo and, incidentally, bill in a lonely wood. Calino walks through the forest looking for an advertisement for bank presidents wanted. He is caught by horrid brigands, shut up in a tower and held (with both hands) for ransom. He writes to his pet father asking that the latter send him $1.69 and a union suit, otherwise he, Calino, will die in captivity. The father replies, saying that he is just out of ransom money, that "Art is long and I am short," and advises Calino to give an imitation of a man escaping from jail. Calino, much incarcerated, wishes that he was a musician so that he could run through the bars. He decides to hide in a mattress and hits the hay most effectually, keeping tabs on the time by the ticking of the mattress. Feigning death by suicide, he almost catches cold in his tongue when he is doused with water. To relieve his loneliness a snake pays him a visit. Calino finds that the sweet litle crawler is a good sport and allows Calino to stretch the truth, incidentally the snake. Calino shows that he has more pull than an alderman, the snake finally arriving by the stretching process to the length of a rope. Calino descends upon the improvised rope. He returns to where he had left his sweetheart four years ago and finds that she still awaits him.

HOP O' MY THUMB is an adaptation of Perrault's fairy story.

Hop O' My Thumb is the youngest of a wood-cutter's seven children. With the coming of the famine, the father suggests that rather than see their children die of hunger that they (the children) should be lost in the forest. Hop O' My Thumb overhears the scheme and when he and his brothers and sisters are taken into the woods to be lost, he fills his pocket with white pebbles, which he drops one by one as the family penetrate the forest. The parents elude the children, abandoning them to the mercy of the forest goblins. Hop O' My Thumb leads the children home by the path of pebbles. The parents are much pleased, for just at this time they receive a sum of money owing to the wood-cutter for past services. Poverty returns and again the wood-cutter determines that there are too many mouths to feed. Hop O' My Thumb this time lets fall crumbs of bread as the parents lead the children into the wilderness. The parents again disappear and Hop O' My Thumb starts triumphantly to lead the children home. There is no path, the birds having eaten the crumbs. Hop O' My Thumb comforts his brothers and sisters and then climbs a high tree. He espies a castle, guides his brothers and sisters toward it. On reaching the castle a large woman tells them that this is the house of an ogre who serves laddies lyonnaise with very little dressing. Hop O' My Thumb replies that the forest wolves would make raw meat sandwiches of them anyhow and that his ambition always was to get stewed. He advises the ogre's wife to tell her husband to keep the children in a cool dark place and shake well before using. The ogre's wife is soft-hearted and decided to shelter the children. The ogre has an appetite worth twenty dollars.. "Fe, fi, fo, fum. I smell the blood of chickens some," he cries. He traces them by the odor and finds the Seven Little Peppers hidden under a bed. He looks them over carefully and confides to his wife that these broilers are scrawny. He says that he will feed them sponges, make them drink water and all will have a swell time. The ogre has seven daughters, each of whom sleep with a golden crown on her head. The seven boys are put to bed in the same room with the seven daughters and Hop O' My Thumb, with characteristic cleverness, takes the gold crowns from the heads of the daughters and puts upon the maidenly curls the little caps belonging to himself and his brothers and sisters. Hop then put on the heads of the latter the gold crowns. The ogre, who had decided not to slaughter the children until morning, gets hungry and reflects that he feels like a little fried boy, that is, he feels like absorbing one. He wonders should he dash mayonnaise in their faces if they would have saucy faces. The ogre takes his large sword and goes into the room where the fourteen children are sleeping. He has been drinking heavily and he does not look further than to kill the children who happen not to wear the gold crowns. Herod had nothing on this gentleman, for he kills the whole seven of his daughters. After he had gone out of the room, Hop O' My Thumb and the others escape. In the morning the ogre's wife finds her daughters dead. The ogre discovers what he has done. He quickly dons his seven league boots and pursues Hop O' My Thumb and the other fugitives. It is a long and stern chase but Hop O' My Thumb and his brothers and sisters had a good, long lead. Drowsy from his libations of the night before, he falls asleep on a rock. Nearby are the hunted children. Hop O' My Thumb daringly pulls off the seven league boots and puts them on his diminutive legs. The boots have magical qualities and shrink to fit him. Hop O' My Thumb then runs back to the ogre's house and tells the ogre's wife that her husband has been captured by suffragists and tells her to give him all the money she has in the house and that he will use it as a dipper to bail out the ogre. Hop O' My Thumb takes his brotbers and sisters to their home, where they are enthusiastically greeted. Hop O' My Thumb's wealth, of course, is an added reason for the hospitality. Hop O' My Thumb explains his wealth by saying that he made the money acting as stenographer in a delicatessen store and bookkeeper in a shooting gallery. Much obliged to the seven league boots, Hop O' My Thumb becomes a king's messenger and procures his family political jobs with nothing to do but bite holes in Swiss cheese. BLACKENED HILLS (Dec. 26).—Human nature is the same the world over, whether we live in the crowded citics or in the silent fastenesses of the mountains. Perhaps those that dwell far from the busy marts of trade feel the impulse of emotion stronger than their city brothers, because there is so little else in their lives.

Up in the mountains lives a girl, hardly more than a child in years, who had excited the interest of two men but from widely different motives. Jack Upham loved Martha Vail with an honest man's affection; Joe Canfield looked upon her with lust in his heart. Among the mountain folks lived Jenny Hart, a woman of unrestrained passions and whose heart was full of evil. Her intense nature had conceived a liking for Jack Upham and she was determined to win his love in return. Alone in one of the wildest canyons of the mountains lived an old woman, reputed to be a witch, who was shunned by the superstitious mountain folks and feared because of her supposed supernatural powers. Because of their attitude her heart was full of bitterness for all mankind. Destitute, she wanders from her cabin in search of food. She stops at the home of Jenny Hart, who, in fear and fury, drives her away with a rifle and, following her, she calls for the assistance of Joe Canfield, who threatens the old woman with violence if she loiters. At the home of Martha Vail she is given food and shelter and human sympathy. Jack's love for Martha is known to Jenny Hart and she plots with Joe to kidnap him and that with the rival out of the way she can secure his heart. The kidnapping is successful and Jack is secured hand and foot and Joe goes to get Martha. She sees him coming and, locking the door, escapes through the window. Joe breaks in the door and finds her gone but, looking through the window, sees her in the distance and pursues her. In the meantime the witch has released Jack and he goes to the rescue of Martha. In order to stop Joe Canfield, the witch sets fire to the undergrowth and soon an enormous fire protects the lovers from the plotters. They wander away in happiness, but in the morning Jenny looks upon Blackened Hills as a result of her sin.

VITAGRAPH

TWO WOMEN AND TWO MEN (Dec. 25).—Feeling that the monotony of domesticity is somewhat irksome to him, James Thornwell casts about for some diversion. He meets Mlle. Valeria, with whom he becomes very much infatuated. She accepts his attentions with inward indifference. Tbornwell is not the only one. Harry Borden, a man of the world, pays her most ardent court. They both send her flowers and other evidences of their admiration. She tries to keep each in ignorance of the other. One day Borden happens in just as Thornwell is leaving. He upbraids Valeria and finds a note from Tbornwell. Acting well her part, she laughingly dismisses the matter and submissively kisses him good-bye. Thornwell, with his wife, attends a ball, where they meet Borden and Valeria. While Borden is talking to Mrs. Thornwell, Valeria takes Mr. Thornwell's arm and walks off with him. Borden graciously offers Mrs. Thornwell his arm and escorts her to the conservatory.

Hoping to compromise Thornwell, he makes love to his wife and attempts to kiss her, for which he receives a smack in the face. Valeria, who has seen Borden making love to Mrs. Thornwell, hastens to Thornwell and induces him to come and behold his wife, hoping to create dissension between them, making him a complete victim to her own wiles. Borden explains to Mrs. Thornwell that his advances to her were encouraged by her husband's attentions to another woman. Then he hands her the note he found on the floor of Valeria's apartment. At this moment her husband enters with Valeria. He accuses his wife of accepting the attentions of Borden. She indignantly denies it. They return to their home, where he again accuses her. Again she denies his accusation. Tearing the note which Borden had given her from the bosom of her dress, she hands it to him and he reads the evidences of his own indiscretion. He realizes the heartless purposes of Valeria and Borden to secure their own ends. His wife, in tears, and he in silent sadness, sees an impassable breach opening up between them. Their little daughter Nellie, hearing her parents, enters the room. Seeing their unhappiness, she tells them to kiss and make up. They follow her suggestion and the happenings of that night are forever buried in the past.

Dr. Squires, the principal, is a hard, penurious man, and when news comes that Albert's father has died, leaving the boy penniless. he is about to turn him out of the school. Florence Chapin, his assistant teacher, however, prevails upon him to allow the boy to remain. She is an ideal teacher and beloved by all the boys. Dr. Squires makes Albert do all the hard work at the school, and, one day, with the assistance of Raymond, he runs away to the city, where he secures employment as a page boy in a hotel. Arthur Cochran, a young lawyer, and Fannie Nugent, a sister of Raymond, are guests at the hotel. They know nothing of Albert's friendship for Raymond, but are interested in the boy. A few weeks later, Squires hears that Albert's father owned mining stock which has become valuable. He goes to Cochran's office and asks him to try and locate the boy. Cochran and Fannie have become engaged, but a jealous quarrel threatens to separate them. Albert contrives and succeeds in bringing t'em together. Raymond visits his sister for the holidays, and when he arrives at the hotel Albert's identity is established. Cochran arranges with Miss Chapin to become a private teacher for the boys and the picture ends showing their delight in the prospect of not having to return to the boarding school.

EDISON

A CLUE TO HER PARENTAGE (Dec. 27).—Being the sixth story of "What Happened to Mary." This new number of the Mary series brings the fascinating heroine back across the ocean after her flying visit to England, and most of the action takes place on board the ship which brings her.

Lieutenant Strakey, Mary's opponent, in "A Letter to the Princess," has been commissioned to go to America and Madam Jolatsky, who had fallen in love with the young officer, throws up her own appointment in London and follows him, taking the same steamer and thereby becoming a fellow-passenger with Mary. Mary's cabin mate is a young woman who seems to be struck with Mary's appearance, and, when Mary is looking over the letter which is the only clue to her mysterious birth and parentage, this young woman, Nell Benson, sees the writing, and so finally succeeds in getting Mary to show her the letter. She then sends a wireless message to some one in New York, expressing the belief that she has found "the missing heiress."

Lieutenant Strakey seizes upon the word heiress, which he happens to catch sight of, and immediately begins attentions to Mary, which Nell Benson does not want her to accept. Besides this Madam Jolatsky speaks to Mary and warns her not to flirt with Strakey. This opposition develops in Mary's desire to play the game to the end, and, she accordingly leads Strakey on. Madam Jolatsky slips a valuable bracelet into Mary's trunk just before the steamer lands in New York. Of course this is found by the customs official and Mary, unable to explain why it is not in her declaration of how she came by it, is arrested. But just at this minute Nell Benson appears with a distinguished looking gentleman whose name seems to create a stir with the officials and who takes charge of the case.

He takes Mary with him, and, bringing her into a great mansion, informs her that this will be her home henceforth. He refuses to tell her more about her family except to point to a portrait on the wall which he tells her is that of her mother. The wanderer has found a home and at least a memory of a mother.

This picture builds up strongly and vitally, and pictorially is exceptionally beautiful.

She sends her maid out for a policeman and the policeman is just about to remove Claude to the lock-up when Pearl's father returns and prevents this sad calamity. Explanations are in order and all is serene, where a few moments before tumult reigned.

A very clever farce, featuring Miss Pearl White, with amusing situations in every scene that make for continuous laughter.

On the same reel:

THE ELOPMENT.—Bessie is in love with Jack. Father dislikes Jack. Bessie and Jack plan to elope. Jack calls for Bessie with a ladder, which he places against the side of the house leading to her room. THE REDEMPTION OF WHITE HAWK (Dec. 31).—John Alston, his wife, their little boy and baby girl, are overtaken while driving, by the Apaches. The man is killed and the woman fatally shot. She has just time to embrace the boy and hang a crucifix around his neck before she dies. The Indians take the boy and the chief adopts him.

A troop of cavalry come across the dead bodies and find the baby alive. They adopt the little girl, around whose neck is placed another crucifix.

The years go by. Dolores is a beautiful girl and the boy is now White Hawk, an Indian chief, whose nature, habits and thoughts are those of a red man. The little Indian maiden, Flower Face, is wrapped up in the young chief. White Hawk leads his warriors to a white settlement, which they raid, and White Hawk carries a portion of the spoils to Flower Face. Refugees reach the fort and give the alarm and the cavalry attack the Indian village and capture the young chief with others. Flower Face follows in grief and, with true Indian cunning, she awaits her chance, and, as night falls, she dashes up and stampedes some of the horses, waving her blanket in their faces. White Hawk and she escape.

The leader of the cavalry is Lieutenant Lawrence, who is Dolores' sweetheart. The lieutenant and Dolores go riding and are captured by White Hawk and his braves. Lawrence is tied to a post and tortured and Dolores is delivered over to the squaws. White Hawk goes in to gloat over the grief of Dolores, who is with Flower Face. He sees her praying, holding up her crucifix. It arrests his attention and compares it with one he wears himself. They are identical. He appeals to the old chief, who estahlishes the relationship between the young chief and Dolores.

Lawrence is set free and Flower Face attends to his wounds as the cavalry dash up. Hostilities are prevented and White Hawk returns with the cavalry to the fort, where the pipe of peace is smoked. The young chief will not stay. He has the ingrained nature of the Indian and loves his life. He also loves the little maid awaiting him. He returns to his camp and to the faithful Flower Face.

FRONTIER

THE HORSE RACE AT HAWLEY'S RANCH (Jan. 1).—If there should be any doubt left in the mind of the most skeptical that woman is the equal of man in many ways at least, and they are sufficiently curious, they might take a trip to certain parts of the West, where they will find health, strength and courage, mentally, physically and morally that marks a beautiful example for any man to follow. Our story deals with the lives of people of this class. A widow has been struggling, while her only daughter has been growing to womanhood, to keep the little ranch home for their own. Reverses came and a mortgage is placed on the ranch. The girl is doing the best she can to assist her mother in handling the cares of life. They are honored and respected by their neighbors, and though poor, are invited to any and all entertainments in that section of the country because the daughter is beautiful and all that goes to make the American woman queen of her sex. A dance is to be held at Hawley's Ranch and Meg and her mother are, of course, invited. A jolly good time is had, such as only those who are possessors of splendid health and spirits fostered by the glorious ranch life can enjoy, where the cowgirl many times shows her superiority even in the handling of horses, as in the case in this little story. While the young folks are enjoying the dance the old folks hike to the house, where old cider is served. They go back to the young dancers and find our heroine has succeeded in lassooing the new hand at Hawley's Ranch. Her long braid of hair has become tangled in one of the buttons of his vest, and, before the untangle is completed, the two young folks are inclined to think that Fate must have had a hand in it, and Meg glides away in the arms of the handsome cowboy to the music of the "turkey trot." We go back to the old folks and find that the cider has started its work and they go out on the lawn and do a "hoe-down" that would make an Irishman green with envy. At its finish old man Hawley is ready to bet every cent he ever saw that his ranch outfit can beat any ranch outfit in the world, and that he has a horse that can beat any horse in America, and he backs his argument with $500 in cash. The notice is written and two of the old sports hike to where the young folks are now spreading themselves in the Virginia reel, and post up their sign. The young folks gather around. The dance comes to an end and each cowboy feels that he has got to win that race, which is to take place the following Thursday. Now comes the homegoing, and the dance at Hawley's Ranch passed into history. The following morning Meg's mother receives notice that unless the $400 can be paid on the mortgage on the coming Thursday, the mortgage will be foreclosed immediately. Meg rides up to the little home, sees her mother is distressed, and asks for the cause. She insists upon reading the letter. She tries to comfort her mother, leading her to the door of their little cottage, she sends her into the house. She stands by the door to think it out. It is then that the thought comes to her why could not she, in the disguise of a man, enter the race the following Thursday, to be held at Hawley's Ranch, for is not her pony, Blackthorn, one of the fleetest-footed animals in that part of the country. Why could not she win that money for the notice read "anyone." She becomes enthused and decides to try it. The scene now shifts to the day of the race. Meg now comes out of her home with a bundle of her father's clothes under her arm that she had dug out from an old trunk in the garret, where they had laid for many years. Her mother inquires where she is going and what she carried. Meg kisses her and tells her to be a dear, good little mother and she will know in time. She mounts and rides away. The scene shifts to the preparation of the race. Cowboys and cowgirls are assembled. There is a riding of bucking horses and a general good time, which comes in such meetings through the West. We now go back to Meg. She has just emerged from a clump of bushes and is now dressed in masculine attire. She mounts her horse and away. We go back to Hawley's ranch. The horses are all lined up, the riders alert and waiting for the pistol shot that will send them dashing away for a mighty struggle. As the shot is about to be fired, Meg drives her horse to the line-up, and as the shot is fired the horses dash away almost simultaneously. As the race progresses we see Meg's horse gradually forging to the front. She passes the third man, then the second, and then in the run to the line that marks the finish, we see her horse gradually wear down the leader, and at the finish she leads by a half length. The race is over and there is great excitement when it is learned that it is Meg who has won the race. One cowboy objects to the payment of the money and slings an insult at Meg. He is rather roughly handled by some of the cowboys, who believe in fair play. The money is turned over to Meg. She hurries home and, as it always goes in stories, is just in time to pay over the money to the man who holds the mortgage and send him on about his business, and in the ending scene, we find Meg standing in the door of her home. She draws her six-shooter from its holster, and after six shots have been fired into the air, she looks just what she really must be considered, "The Man of the House."

Arriving home at tea-time, and not being permitted to join her mother's company on the veranda, Margery pours a tub of water on them from above. The curate evidently imagines a return of the flood and strikes out madly in an endeavor to swim to safety. What then happens to Margery can better be imagined than described.

VICTOR

THE GROUCH (Jan. 3).—John Morgan was a grouch. Everyone knew it, too. His stenographer, Kate, who had the patience of Job, knew how to handle him, that is, she let him rave until one day when it was cold and he insisted upon having the window open right over her head, her patience gave out and she simply told him in a very emphatic manner that "she would not freeze to death for any man." The idea of anyone daring to talk back to him was more than he could stand, and she was immediately dismissed from his employ.

A few days before this a pretty little girl named Nan Keyes applied for a position in the office. Kate told her there was no opening, but John Morgan upon entering the room heard Kate's remark and immediately found a position for Nan in the stockroom to take the position of shipping clerk, which had been held by Dan, whom Morgan put back in the shipping room with the other boys. Immediately upon Kate's dismissal from the office Nan was asked if she could do stenography, and as she could, she was taken into the office to work. Here she proved a good match for John Morgan. Kate had told her before she left just how Morgan had treated her and Nan was prepared. If Morgan was cold Nan would open the window, if he was warm, she would shut it. Morgan often wondered why he did not discharge her, but Nan held her own.

One day Nan caught a dreadful cold from the window she had left open to make Morgan angry. Although she was freezing cold she kept it open because she knew he was too. That day he left the office before she did and, on going out, dropped his wallet on the floor without any knowledge of it. Nan immediately found it when she started to go home, and having no place to keep it until morning, she put it in her bag for safety. Now, Nan had an enemy in an admirer of hers. Dan, of the shipping room, who had been an ardent admirer of Nan's overstepped courtesy one day and Nan had given him a good slap in the face before the eyes of his fellow-workmen, and he was ready for revenge.

His time came soon enough for just as Nan picked up the purse he stepped into the room and then quickly out again, having seen her put the wallet into her own bag. The next day Nan was too sick to come to work, and when John Morgan inquired if anyone had heard from her, Dan told what he had seen. Morgan did not believe Dan and forbade him to say anything more on the subject, but went straight to Nan's house. He was surprised to find her in such poor lodgings, and found that she supported her good-for-nothing father, who inhabited the saloons. To this father she had given the wallet to be returned to Mr. Morgan, when she found she was too ill to go to business. He stopped in to treat his friends and when Nan and Mr. Morgan found him, some of the money had disappeared. It was then that John Morgan found that Nan should not live with this dreadful father of hers, but when he told her so she would not give into him, so they both decided to go halfway, which they did, from then for the rest of their lives together.

PUNCH

HER MISCHIEVOUS BROTHER (Jan. 2).—Count "No Account" borrows enough money to come to the land of beautiful heiresses and meets the "Queen of the Human Race," who is struggling along on a few paltry million a year. The "Queen" falls for the Count's accent and her poor boob sweetheart finds himself relegated to the side lines with the rest of the substitutes. But the "Queen" has a kid brother who is a throw-back to the ancestor who collected the change. The kid knows a "bunk" count by instinct and sides with the boob. He helps him secret himself in a suit of armor, where he can watch the Count and the "Queen" say sweet nothings to each other, and incidentally make things unpleasant for his foreign rival. With the kid's active aid—made more active by the promise of a ten-dollar bill—the "no account" Count counts for very little, especially in the police station, where the last act but one is enacted. The last act being little Herbert Rice trying to put ten pounds of candy into a two-pound capacity stomach.

On the same reel:

A NEAR TRAGEDY.—The trouble starts when the parents of little Herbert Rice leave him and his tiny sister in full possession of the house while they go to a matinee. Sis wants to play "lady," but her mother's new evening gown is so long that it is necessary to cut a few feet of the skirt off to make it fit. Rice finds that his father's silk hat and grandmother's glasses make him look like a first-class doctor, so it is necessary for his Sis to be taken desperately ill so that little Doctor Rice can perform an operation. It takes a large bottle of red ink to furnish the requisite amount of blood, and when the children hear their parents returning, the bedroom looks like a slaughterhouse. Fearing a whipping, Rice and Sis hide behind the portieres, and the unhappy parents think that they have been murdered. A famous detective, backed by the police department, finds some wonderful clues and is making a name for himself when the kids appear and solve the most horrible crime since Abel was bumped off by his strenuous brother Cain.

MAJESTIC

WONDERS OF SURGERY (Dec. 17).—Little Bobbie Ashley, after meeting with a serious accident, lies in a critical condition at a big hospital. The doctors, after further examining him, decided that only skin grafted from another can help him. His parents willingly offer theirs, but the professor refuses the sacrifice, telling them that it will be necessary to have the skin of a child about the boy's own age. He suggests that they place an ad in the papers. This is done and it calls forth an assortment of children of all kinds and ages. Little Alma Ashley hears the talk about skin-grafting and gets her nurse to explain all about it. When she realizes what is to be done she begs permission to give her own skin to save her little brother. Her parents will not permit this for a moment—for with one child lying so close to death they do not want to take any chances with the other. They finally select a healthy little girl of Alma's age, and for the consideration of $100, she promises to be at the hospital in the morning. Alma decides to outwit them, so before little Mary Murphy arrives Alma goes to the doctors and says that she is the little girl who is selling her skin. She is believed and placed in the boy's room. The operation takes place, and when the parents are permitted to see the boy, their surprise at finding Alma there is very great. They are worried at first, but the doctor soon convinces them that both children are all right and that Bobby, owing to Alma's sacrifice, will soon be well.

ALL ON ACCOUNT OF A BANANA (Dec. 24).—A young Italian, Tony, lands in New York with his young wife and purchases a new push-cart and a supply of bananas. He kisses his wife and baby good-bye and starts out to do his first day's business. Jim, the young policeman who patrols the beat upon which Tony takes his stand, makes love to Nora, who is Judge Nolan's cook. He then helps himself to one of Tony's bananas and an argument is started which lands Tony in the station house before Judge Nolan. Tony sends word to his wife, who, in order to pay his fine, goes to the pawnshop to pawn her wedding ring. The policeman, in bad temper, calls upon the Judge's cook, and when about to ask her to marry him, gets into a quarrel with her and goes to the same pawnshop to pawn the engagement ring. He sees the Italian's wife and begins to repent his ill temper. The cook, all upset over her quarrel with the cop, spoils the Judge's dinner and he quarrels with his wife, who leaves him and goes to a lawyer to arrange for a separation. Tony's wife pays his fine and they are mourning the loss of his stock of bananas, when the automobile in which the Judge's wife, who is riding to her lawyer's, strikes Tony and injures him slightly. Mrs. Nolan faints and is carried into a drug store with the Italian. The Judge arrives on the scene with the cook, where they met Jim the cop. Nora forgives him, the Judge and his wife are reconciled, and Tony is made the recipient of a large sum of money to celebrate the glad reunions.

THANHOUSER

A MILITANT SUFFRAGETTE (Dec. 29).—The course of true love was running very smoothly until the girl became interested in the cause of votes for women. Her fiance did not approve of it. There was a quarrel, and the engagement ring was haughtily returned.

The young woman not only stubbornly refused to make up, but decided to become a really, truly, militant suffragette. One of the Amazon leaders from England was in New York at the time, preparing for the kind of revolution that is so popular in London. Under her banner the girl enrolled, pledging herself to "annoy, harass and intimidate tyrant men until they are permitted to vote." In pursuance of this amiable purpose the militants went out on a little window-smash'ing expedition one day. The girl was arrested, but the others escaped. One of the fugitives met the ex-fiance and told him the horrible details. He went to the rescue in a taxicab, became peevish when held up for speeding, attacked a policeman and was arrested.

In police court the former lovers met and were reconciled. Even-handed justice gave them equal rights, ten days in jail each. They did not want their friends to know the facts, so, before being led to their respective cells, they were hastily married, and the girl's father received word that they were on their honeymoon and would return in ten days. He had planned a big church wedding and was naturally upset, but, as he said, "It is hard to understand young folks these days." And the truth of this most peculiar honeymoon never came out.

WITH THE MOUNTED POLICE (Dec. 31).—The aqueduct police had many duties to perform, and continual vigilance was the price of order, owing to the fact that many dangerous aliens were in the territory they guarded.

On one occasion the captain received an anonymous warning that the men in a certain section of the works were planning violence because certain concessions they demanded had been refused. The captain called upon one of his brightest young men to find out if there was any truth in the statement. The patrolman disguised himself, secured work as a laborer and soon became on friendly and confidential terms with his associates. He learned that the warning was true, communicated with his captain by 'phone, and agreed to meet a party of police that night at a certain spot in the road and lead them to the conspirators.

One of the criminals, however, was suspicious and had secretly trailed the patrolman, learning that he was a spy. That evening a number of the men attacked the detective while he was walking along the road, overpowered, hound and gagged him, and then threw him into a newly completed reservoir which was empty. They then turned on the water, insuring a slow but certain death.

Before the young man started out on his detective work, he had taken his pet dog and consigned him to his sweetheart, a country girl, who lived near the aqueduct. On the night he was overpowered the dog ran away from his new mistress, being lonesome without his master. Along the rough roads and through the woods he traced his owner, finally locating him in the slowly filling aqueduct.

The girl was in the cottage when the dog returned, and the animal's excitement led her to believe that something was wrong. She followed the dog, and he led her to the aqueduct, where she arrived just in time to save the policeman's life. The bluecoat, although unstrung by his terrible experience, was in time to meet the detachment of his comrades and guide them to where the conspirators were. The dangerous gang were placed behind the bars, and the girl whose bravery saved a life later became the bride of the policeman.

ECLAIR

THE WAGER (Dec. 31).—Do you think it is possible for a man who is perfectly innocent of any crime or offense to be arrested?

In this picture, Bert Van thought such a thing impossible and backed his opinion to the amount of five thousand dollars, and this is how it happened.

Bert and his chum, Jack de Puyster, were on their way to the club one evening when they saw two policemen arresting a rather rough-looking character. Bert was inclined to be sympathetic over the episode but Jack laughed at him, stating that such arrests were without doubt a necessary protection for society at large. He took strong exception to Jack's assertion that an absolutely innocent man could not be arrested and thrown into jail and promptly accepted his friend's offer to lay a wager of five thousand dollars that he could be arrested without committing a misdemeanor or crime of any kind.

Jack secured some old and very shabby clothes, and dressed in these, entered a very swell cafe. The sight of him aroused the disgust of the other diners, one of whom complained to the proprietor, who, in turn, 'phoned to the police. The police arrive, Jack is arrested as a suspicious character and taken to court. From the station house he sent a note to Bert telling him of his predicament and requesting his assistance to get out. Bert realized that he had lost his wager, but wishing to play a joke on his friend, comes to court and denies all knowledge of him.

Meanwhile Jack's valet, having become greatly alarmed at his master's unusual absence, hurried to the home of Miss Livingstone, Jack's fiancee, and told her of his fears. Miss Livingstone and her mother hastened to the police station to notify the police and there find Jack. Of course, on their identification, he is promptly released, and when Bert arrives a second time at the station he is arrested and thrown into a cell for playing pranks with the force.

However, it all ends well with the police captain a guest of the two boys at their club.

A TAMMANY BOARDER (Jan. 2).—In this picture the Eclair's new stock member, the Royal Bengal Tiger, "Princess," plays the leading role, and plays it as well as any other member of this or any other stock company could play it.

The owner of "Princess" is forced to leave his boarding house and, owing to his nonpayment of rent, he is forced to leave his trunk behind. Now, in this trunk he has been keeping his pet tiger, and so, the landlady and maid, in search of something of value in it, they permit the tiger to escape and then the fun commences.

The tiger searches through the entire house for his master, frightening the inmates nearly to death and causing no end of an uproar.

The owner is finally sent for and, returning, removes the tiger from the premises and is well rewarded.

As one may easily imagine, the chances for screaming situations in this story are almost infinite and all members of the cast—plus a competent director—have succeeded in making this comedy a perfect riot of fun.

CRAWFISH (Jan. 5).—The crawfish is sometimes called "The small lobster of fresh water." This particular crustacean is of nocturnal habits, remaining hidden during the day in crevices and under stones at the river-bottom. All this is portrayed in this film. We also see females at hatching time and the methods by which crawfish are caught in specially constructed nets. Then we are shown the worst enemy of this little fish—which is the water-rat; and last the exposition of the several scientific methods employed for the artificial acceleration of breeding and replenishing or restocking of river-beds with this delicate sea food, which once threatened to become extinct.

On the same reel:

WILLY, KING OF THE JANITORS.—Willy's parents, janitors, leave the house in his care and he, of course, takes the job seriously. He starts by pushing aside a porter, who is carrying a trunk upstairs, and a tenant, who did not wipe his feet off before entering the house. Annoyed by an organ grinder, Willy makes him get out in a hurry. He becomes furious when one of the tenants shakes a rug out of a window. Coming downstairs, he sees an old lady with a small dog. "No dogs in this house," says Willy. He spills water over the old lady and lets the dog loose. It runs away, followed by its mistress. In spite of a notice that no orders will be given after ten o'clock in the morning, a few tradesmen arrive and they are well received by Willy.

As it is the day the rents are due, the landlord calls to collect them, but Willy thinks it is not yet time and gets out a hose with which he wets everyone in sight. His mother returns and Willy receives proper attention which his excess of zeal has won.

SOLAX

COUSINS OF SHERLOCK HOLMES (Jan. 1).—The police are on the lookout for Jim Spike, alias Jim Nail, a dangerous highway robber, who has been working with more or less success, without being apprehended.

The chief of the detective bureau puts two new detectives on the case, and enjoins them to be very careful in their investigation, and not to come back without landing the prisoner. The three detectives soon come upon Edgar Carroll, in whom they immediately see a striking resemblance to Spike, the crook. They shadow Edgar from place to place, and soon his life becomes one long game of hide-and-seek with the detectives. Finally, Edgar consults his friend, and they both decide to give the detectives a merry chase. Edgar and his friend dress as women and parade the streets in their ludicrous feminine attire. They flirt with the detectives and entice them away from their duty. They do not discover the real identity of their charming feminine companions until they accidentally come upon them one evening and see them leisurely, and with enjoyment, smoking a clear Havana cigar. This shocking and unfeminine spectacle arouses their suspicions, but the boys are too clever for these cousins of Sherlock Holmes, and with the aid of an automobile, give them the slip—but the detectives eventually turn up again and arrest the masqueraders. However, they do not remain long in the police station, for the real Jim Spike turns up soon as the crook who tried to snatch Jane Ellery's purse on the ferryboat. Jane Ellery is Edgar Carroll's sweetheart, and she recognizes him.

A few more complications arise, however, until Edgar and the crook are seen side by side and their likeness discovered, and the cousins of Sherlock Holmes see they have been misguided in their investigations.

CANINE RIVALS (Jan. 3).—Harry and his wife Mary are young newlyweds and live in unalloyed bliss until Mary increases the family by adding to it a little Pomeranian pup, one similar to that of her friends.

Soon Mary transfers her affections from Harry to the new addition to the family, much to the chagrin and discomfort of Harry. He is denied the companionship of his wife, and, instead of engaging him in morning and evening conversations, she entertains her pup.

When Harry sees that the little Pomeranian has entirely alienated his wife's affections, he decides to get some canine rivals, and install them in the house. A war of jealousy ensues. There are scenes with Mary trying to feed her pet and Harry endeavoring to feed his. Life in the house eventually becomes unendurable, and a compromise is soon effected, wherein it is agreed that while Mary can keep her pet, she must not neglect her husband; that she is to treat him better than a dog.

RELIANCE

ROWDY COMES HOME (Dec. 21).—Mr. and Mrs. Norman have a dog, Rowdy, to whom they are devoted. But after the birth of her first baby, Mrs. Norman listens to the stories of her maid, who fears all dogs. She tells the anxious mother that dogs are treacherous—particularly when there are children about. Believing this may possibly be the case with Rowdy, Mrs. Norman persuades her husband to send the faithful little fellow away. Mr. Norman gives the dog over to the care of a farmer. That night Rowdy breaks loose and runs back home. Mr. Norman is overjoyed to see him, but his wife insists that he take the dog back next day. This is done, the farmer assuring Norman that Rowdy will not be able to get away again. That afternoon the maid takes the baby out to the park in its carriage. She meets her sweetheart, and leaving the carriage in a secluded spot they start off for a little walk. About this time Rowdy breaks loose again and starts for home. Some dry autumn leaves on the ground near the baby's carriage catch fire. The dog passes through the park on his way home. He recognizes the carriage and jumps up to see that the flames have almost reached its coverings. He dashes home, and when he finds Mr. Norman, he barks and shows so evidently that something is wrong, that his master finally follows him to the park. They arrive just in time for the father to rescue his baby from the flames that are burning away the carriage draperies. Baby is carried home and Rowdy follows. When she hears the story, Mrs. Norman once again puts her faith in the dog, and willingly agrees that he may stay home. The maid comes in a few moments later all excited over the disappearance of the child and the burned carriage, and she is at once dismissed.

BEDELIA HAS A TOOTHACHE (Dec. 25).—Bedelia suffers with a terrible toothache. All the remedies that her fellow servants have suggested she use have only caused her worse pain. Unable to stand it any longer she decides to go to see a dentist and visits one in the neighborhood. At first she refuses to permit him to touch her face, but he finally removes the bandages and takes a look at the aching molar. She gives vent to a terrible scream, frightening both the dentist and his assistant. When she sees the forceps she gets nervous and insists upon gas. The gas tank is brought out—and it takes the whole tankful before Bedelia is quieted. But as soon as he touches the tooth she comes back to consciousness and, grabbing the dentist around the neck, she beats him terribly, and after smashing up the whole office, she leaves with the aching tooth still in the same place.

MANY NEW MOVING PICTURE THEATRES IN NEW YORK STATE

The indications gathered from new machine sales by J. H. Hallberg, "The Economizer Man," point to the opening of many new theatres for motion pictures in Syracuse, Oswego, and neighboring towns in that vicinity. Mr. Hallberg has just shipped two Powers No. 6A, and three Standard Hallberg A. C. Economizers to James Kernan, Syracuse, N. Y. Two Simplex machines with two Hallberg Standard A. C. Economizers to Chas. P. Gilmore, Oswego, N. Y. One 1913 Motiograph to Castle Theatre, Syracuse, N. Y., and one Powers No. 6A, with Hallberg Standard A. C. Economizer to Stanley Southworth, Canton, N. Y.

In the above picture are presented the members of the Eclair Western Stock Company and include Eleanor Parker, Lucille Young and Mae Wells. Lamar Johnstone, Jack Johnstone, Hal Wilson, George Larkin and Lindsay Hall. Bill Haddock is director and manager. Besides these principals there will be a company of 125 cowboys and Indians and as many cow ponies.

From the Daily Consular and Trade Reports we clipped the following:

"Cinematograph Films.—A foreign business man informs an American consular officer that he would like to get in touch with American manufacturers of cinematograph films. He desires to secure the agency for these companies in Eastern Russia and Western Siberia. Correspondence may be in English or German."

FILMS THAT BOOST THEMSELVES

COUSINS of SHERLOCK HOLMES
RELEASED WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 1

Because there happens to be a striking resemblance between Edgar Carroll and a noted criminal, Edgar is pestered by the sleuths. He gets even on some would-be detectives by disguising as a woman and then there ensues a merry chase, and there is a complication in mistaken identities.

CANINE RIVALS
RELEASED FRIDAY, JANUARY 3

When Harry sees that the little Pomeranian entirely alienates his wife's affections, he decides to get some canine rivals, and installs in the house pups of all descriptions to whom he transfers his affections. A war of jealousy ensues. There are scenes with Mary trying to feed her pet, and Harry endeavoring to feed his. Life in the house eventually becomes unendurable, and a compromise is soon effected, wherein it is agreed that while Mary may keep her pet, she must not neglect her husband, that she is to treat him better than a dog.

A MILLION DOLLARS
RELEASED WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 8

A clerk, dissatisfied with his existence, dreams that every man in this world has a million dollars. He goes to the restaurant and finds that there isn't a waiter around to serve him and here reads a notice to the effect that they have all retired, being satisfied with their fortune. Wherever he goes he cannot be served because no one wants to work.

THE MUTINY OF MR. HENPECK
RELEASED FRIDAY, JANUARY 10

Mr. Henpeck weighs one hundred pounds and his wife weighs two hundred and fifty. Everything wifey says goes until Mr. Henpeck is set upon too heavily, and then the "worm turns".

(The Journal of Information for Literary Workers) published in your interest for eighteen years, is the magazine of which Jack London said: "I may not tell a hundredth part of what I learned from THE EDITOR, but I may say that it taught me how to solve the stamp and landlord problems." It is a monthly stimulus to the production and sale of more and better manuscripts. Besides articles of concrete, practical worth by editors or by writers successful or about to be successful, each number contains in "The Literary Market" all the news of all the magazines, new and old, that pay for manuscripts.

THE EDITOR is especially helpful to the scenario writer. It publishes from time to time helpful articles by those who are successful producers of photoplays. A copy of the current number will be sent for 15 cents. The yearly subscription is one dollar.

New Year Resolutions of the Gaumont Co.

1. To continue to make motion pictures that the American people want.
2. To have them excellent in photography.
3. To have them in story interesting and strong.
4. High in character, tasteful and discreet—devoid of low sensationalism but active in brisk significance.
5. To have picture titles and sub-titles which not merely explain the story but enliven and enrich it.
6. To design lithographs, magnetic both to eye and money—posters which show the vital essence of the subject rousing to action the desire to go "inside."
7. To accomplish the mission of cinematography—portraying before the common people life's common and uncommon experiences, showing how this and the "other half" live, laugh and love.

IS IT RESOLVED that exhibitors will give their audiences every opportunity to judge whether these resolutions are faithfully fulfilled?

New Year's Greetings

Health, Happiness and Prosperity to All for Nineteen Hundred and Thirteen

IT has been my custom at the end of each year to write a short retrospection over the past year's progress in Cinematography, and, carrying out the ideas of the past six years, I ask my readers to go with me a little while through the past year and note the progress that has been made. Five years ago I spoke on the educational advantages of the moving picture and advocated the progression of the art. I then stated that there was too much time wasted in the producing of plays in illogical films, asking for something that every man, woman and child could see with the greatest of delight and pleasure without a question of reserve opinion in their mind after seeing the subject.

My early writings of five years ago have been copied broadcast during the past year and rehashed as being something new, and instead of giving me credit for those sentiments they are put in their paper as though the writers had discovered something entirely new; yet they knew, at the time they were repenning these extracts, that they were simply stealing ideas from my writings on the true elevation of the industry. With this little digression, I will come to the beginning of 1912, when the chaotic condition of the business was such that no one knew altogether where they stood, and to-day it is in a still worse condition, for companies spring up like a gourd which withers in a day, others quarrel so much among themselves and are so jealous one of the other that an element of distrust and discord is the result.

The industry during the past year has advanced so rapidly that a man in an office chair one week, receiving a salary of $15 a week, has suddenly become a manager at $75 a week, and this has so turned his head that he scarcely knows where he stands to-day. These irresponsible individuals have done more to injure the industry during the past year than it is possible to express in cold type. The stories filmed have been very much below the average of two years ago, the photography has not been so perfect, the plots and stories have not been so good, and the utter lack of originality has been most observant. The plagiarism of stories has been so great that if I were to make a seriatim of the whole of the pictures that have been made it would be possible to find 90 per cent. of them have been rehashed stories from prominent authors, but done in such a way as not to infringe upon the copyright privileges. At the same time it skimmed very close to the edge of the danger line. The lack of stories relating to public events and of true history has been most noticeable. 'Tis true, 'tis pity, 'tis, 'tis true that some of the best scenarios ever submitted to directors have been thrown down in preference to some mediocre, wishy-washy triangle love stories. Even the Western subjects are not true to life; in fact, it is a disgrace upon the Indian race and the cowboys, either of old or to-day, to depict them in such glaring inconsistencies. This has become more observant as the year ran its course, so much so that the Censorship Board had to request yards and yards of film be taken away. To quote from a letter of an esteemed friend, who says: "I have a lot of material, many real clean frontier stories that should and would take the place of the blood-and-thunder rot and vile misrepresentations of my Western country that is disgusting to real frontier men and real cowboys, and I frankly say to you, from a real frontier man and late Chief of Scouts, 'God bless you for your opposition to the misleading and immoral plays, and all good men and women will applaud you in your efforts to protect our boys and girls against such degrading and suggestive pictures.'" This is only one of a number we have received from people who know, and when we say that the directors have no more ideas of the plays they have staged and no more conception of the truths at all in the pictures than the various schoolboys of any high school in the city.

A very important development of the year was the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League and the campaign they made in each State of the Union. While originally formed in 1911, it can be safely said that 1912 saw the full work and the power of its influence. Reports of new States brought into the ranks, coming in with frequency and regularity, told of unremitting, indefatigable, enthusiastic work on the part of M. A. Neff, and incomplete though the work may yet be, the exhibitors of the country are now knit into a most powerful unit, and in a little while their efforts for a selection of a program, independent of any exchange or manufacturer, is assured. They are formed into one grand organization, the greatest influence for good in the industry.

Leaving the pictures and coming to still more important matters, the past year has seen swept away the last vestige of patent litigation, and if my readers care to take the trouble of going through my editorials for the past six years they will see how much I had to do with the present condition of affairs. I need not dwell on this phase of the subject. It is too well known to my readers, and I am thankful to say that there is a new year dawning for Cinematography that only those who have the acumen and earnest purpose of following out the true desires of the public will have a chance of remaining in the business. The old regime of plots and stories are rapidly getting away to feature film subjects, which, in my estimation, is one of the best steps taken during this year drawing to a close. The feature film is the film of the future, and when the open market arrives—and when I say open market I do not mean an indiscriminate flooding of rubbish set afloat by office boys, but the best elements of the industry coming together with a strong leader, a powerful man of affairs who dares to think and do all to the highest and the best elevation of the industry we have so much at heart.

The New Year will more than fully recompense all the industry for the work that has been done in the past.

Alfred H. Saunders.

IT'S A GIRL

Mr. and Mrs. William A. Reed (Vitagraph Bill), of Pennsylvania avenue, North, Atlantic City, N. J., are receiving congratulations on the birth of a daughter. Little Miss Reed is the only girl in the family, the other three children all being boys.

OHIO CONVENTION NOTES

The big annual State convention of Ohio is causing the exhibitors all over the State to get busy. Great enthusiasm is apparent everywhere in the State. The Motion Picture Exhibitors of Ohio now realize that they have a chance to secure a square deal for the first time in the history of the organization. They propose to present such progressive bills to the legislature as will meet the approval of the people of Ohio as well as the Motion Picture Exhibitors. It is confidently expected that there will be at least one thousand exhibitors in the city of Columbus on the 21st and 22d of January, 1913. The only program for the convention will be a very small one, announcing the time and date of convention and the entertainment to be given. The program will be as follows:

January 21, 1913, the convention will be called to order at 1:30 p. m. at Southern Hotel Hall to adjourn at 5 p. m. Will again meet at 7:30 p. m., where pictures, vaudeville and other entertainment will be given until 9 p. m., when all will go to the Colonial Theatre and enjoy a splendid entertainment arranged for them by the local committee.

At 10 a. m. Wednesday morning, January 22, the convention will meet in executive session and will adjourn promptly at 11:30 a. m., and, on the invitation of Governor J. M. Cox, will proceed to march in a body to the capitol, where Governor Cox and his staff will be in waiting to receive them. After paying their respects to the Governor, they will, with the Governor, go in a body to the front of the State capitol, where a motion picture will be taken, then they will adjourn until 1:30 p. m. when another executive session will be held. At 7:30 p. m. the night of the 22d, a banquet will be given in the large dining-room of the Southern Hotel, where it is expected not less than five hundred will partake of the bountiful feast prepared by the Southern Hotel. Governor J. M. Cox, Senator J. B. Foraker, national attorney; J. J. Lentz, associated attorney, and several other distinguished speakers will be present. Mr. M. A. Neff will act as toastmaster.

The national vice-president's committee will meet on the morning of the 23d of January and remain in session until the executive business is transacted.

The first day meeting will be an open one. Everybody is invited, all of the manufacturers, film men and those who are not members of our league are invited; in fact, everybody that has an interest in the elevation of cinematography will be welcome.

The convention will be held under one roof. There will be ample time given for all to see the exhibits, as every exhibit will be in the lobby of the hotel, or in the parlor, or on the second floor, where there is plenty of room for the exhibition of goods. A reasonable price will be charged, and as there will be no program advertising, all who wish space to exhibit their goods are requested to write to M. A. Neff, No. 1003 Mercantile Library Bldg., Cincinanti, Ohio, and diagrams and prices will be furnished.

OUTWITTING A RIVAL
Great Northern, December 28.

THE FIRE AT SEA

(Great Northern Special)

A splendid offering has been made in the two-reel special of the above title. This is a wonderfully realistic film, a costly film and one that has been most carefully produced. A large ocean liner was actually burned up at sea in order to get the necessary atmosphere.

The following is a brief synopsis of the story:

The drama opens with Mary Wilson and her father, Captain Wilson, of the steamship "Sverige," seated in a box in one of the fashionable continental music halls. It is the occasion of the farewell appearance of Frank Harvey, a popular young entertainer, who is to sail for America on the following day. Mary becomes enamored of the young actor. Next morning the "Sverige" is in readiness to sail and Mary, who has accompanied her father on his voyages ever since the death of her mother, scans the purser's list in hopes that Harvey may be a passenger. A few minutes later he boards the vessel. An affection which ripens into love springs up between them. During the voyage the cargo of the ship takes fire, gaining rapid headway in spite of the efforts of the seamen to extinguish the flames. Mary and Harvey, while the other passengers are enjoying themselves within, strolling out on the decks, become acquainted with the alarming condition of the ship. Mary runs to her father to corrobarate what she fears.

"The passengers must not know of this until all hope is gone!" exclaims the captain. "Have Harvey entertain them in the saloon."

Harvey promises to do as requested and Mary, mounting the rostrum, announces that the popular young entertainer has consented to amuse the passengers for a time. Little do they suspect that the ship's wireless operator, with his earpieces firmly clasped to his head, is pounding out the "C. Q. D." signal across the vast expanse of ocean. But the distress signal remains unanswered, and in the meantime, captain and crew are fighting more desperately as the flames increase in fierceness. In the cabin, Harvey has exhausted his repertoire, and under the terrific nervous strain he falls in a faint behind a curtain. The passengers are about to leave when Mary announces that she will still further entertain them. This ruse succeeds in averting the inevitable panic for a time at least.

Eight miles distant the steamship "Adelaide" is shaping a course that would take her far away from the burning ship, when the wireless operator is startled by the call for help from the "Sverige." A message of hope is sent back to the doomed ship, and immediately a course is laid for the burning craft. Captain Wilson has ordered the life boats cleared preparatory to abandoning the vessel, and scarcely has this been done when a cloud of smoke belches into the saloon. Panic and pandemonium follow in the mad rush to reach the lifeboats. Some leap into the sea with life preservers.

The "Adelaide" arrives in time to rescue all the passengers, and seeing that his vessel is doomed, Captain Wilson is the last to leave her after giving orders that she be towed by the rescue ship. But in the excitement, Mary and Harvey have been overlooked, and are facing death aboard the burning craft when Harvey espies the towing cable. It is their only hope, and they attempt to work their way across by this means. They are seen by Captain Wilson and are rescued from their perilous position. There is a joyous reunion aboard the "Adelaide" while the lovers plight their troth under the grim shadow cast by the smoke that pours from the doomed steamship.

SCENE FROM "A MILLION DOLLARS." SOLAX

A MILLION DOLLARS

Featuring Darwin Karr

(Solax)

Jim Fuller is employed in a broker's office, at a small salary, and one Saturday night after he gets his pay envelope, he expresses his dissatisfaction with the way his employer is treating him. Like a good many other clerks, instead of trying to be industrious, and giving the firm more service than he is being paid for, he simply neglects his work, and grumbles, because he is not paid what he deserves. He expresses some anarchistic beliefs, and asserts that "every man should have a million dollars, and that the wealth of the world should be distributed equally."

He goes home brooding over the way the world is treating him, and the more he thinks of this idea—of distribution of wealth—the more he becomes in favor of it. At home this theory is uppermost in his mind, and before long he sits back in his chair and dreams that the wealth of the world has been re-distributed, and that every man is a millionaire. He sees himself and his wife in fine clothes, living at a fashionable hotel, but he soon finds difficulty in getting service.

The elevator boy at the hotel refuses to take him up and down because he is satisfied with his fortune. The cook and the maids, the stewards and the clerks, all refuse to work because they are satisfied with their living. He tries to engage a taxicab, and the taxicab driver refuses to run his car, because he is satisfied with his fortune He tries to use a street car, and the conductor and motorman are too busy counting their money to run the line. In disgust he walks many miles, looking for a restaurant, but every restaurant that he comes to has a sign to the effect that the proprietor has retired from business, owing to the fact that he has all the money he needs.

Hungry and fatigued, he cames home—his wife almost starving and sick from privation He tries to call a doctor, and the doctor refuses to come out to see the patient because he is too busy counting his "million."

After many other disquieting experiences, Fuller wakes up with a start, and realizes that he is in his own home, and the idea dawns on him that this world would be very uncomfortable to live in if all persons were millionaires.

The object lesson is complete, and he is quite satisfied that it is up to him to make his way, and not wait until the "millennium" comes, and the wealth of the world is equally distributed.

ESSANAY ACTOR DEAD

Harry Cashman, a leading character actor with the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company, and one of the most popular of picture play performers, was buried on Monday, December 16th, from his home, 4356 Kenmore avenue. He died Saturday of heart disease. Before going into the moving picture field he was a light opera comedian, for years being connected with the Tivoli Opera Company, of San Francisco. He starred for two years in "Chimmy Fadden," and played two seasons with Richard Carle in "The Spring Chicken," and other musical comedies. He is survived by his sister, Mrs. G. Jenneret, with whom he made his home.

HER MISCHIEVOUS BROTHER

Punch, January 2.

MISS NELL MORGAN

Round the personality of the subject of this article centers a story for a scenario. "Scene I—Broadway Subway Station at Forty-second street. A pickpocket takes Miss Morgan's purse and jewels. Detective arrests youth (Charles Winters), who is taken to West Side Court, accompanied by the usual crowd. The train, which has been delayed for twenty minutes, passes on, and traffic is resumed. Scene II—At the West Side Police Court Miss Morgan refuses to prosecute the boy. She says on the appeal of the boy to the detective to let him go free: 'This is Christmas time, and I am willing to be lenient, if you are,' but no, the grim arm of the law sends the prisoner to the lockup, the trial to come on after Christmas. Miss Morgan refuses to make a complaint against him, and says she wants him released before Christmas, which is refused.

"Scene III—Miss Morgan's apartment in New York. Enter an old lady of 73 years of age, accompanied by a woman who said she was a cousin, and saying that the old lady is a Jewess unable to speak English, and is the mother of the boy in the lockup. They plead with Miss Morgan to withdraw the charge. She says there is no charge, as she has absolutely refused to make one, and it is up to the City authorities. The young woman acting as interpreter says this is the first charge against the boy, and only once before was he taken to court on a misunderstanding, and dismissed. Scene IV—West Side Court. Miss Morgan tries to get his release and they show her a police court record of several indictments during the past three years. The mother and the cousin, who ultimately turns out to be a daughter of the woman, and sister of the prisoner appeal again to her not to press the case. The sequel is not yet."

Who is this Miss Nell Morgan who has made so much fuss? She is one of those bright moving picture actresses who has a heart, and can feel for others' troubles. She has been in the industry for some considerable time now, her introduction came about by Mr. Hopper of Essanay, who lived in the same house with her, asking her if she would like to play in a picture he was making. She consented, and since that time she has no desire to do anything else but stay in the pictures. She has posed with Essanay Company, the American and with Pathe. She can ride, swim, row, or do anything expected of a high-class athlete actress, such as is desired in the motion picture art. She posed in the "Feud of Black Hawk," an American subject, taking the part of Elizabeth Taylor, and several other leading character sketches. Since coming to New York she has posed in Mr. Euclid Garrick's masterpieces of Shakespeare to be issued by the Rex Company, and also several scenes for the Imp Company, so that if someone now writes a scenario around her individuality she will be able to reenact the conditions as above outlined.

FEATURE FILM MANUFACTURING CO., OF WASHINGTON, D. C.

As the eyes of the entire world, and America especially, are focused at present on the Panama Canal, the reels being issued by the Feature Film Manufacturing Company, of Washington, D. C., will prove one of the most important features offered to the exhibitor for a long time. By special privilege, L. J. Simons, of the Feature company, accompanied President Taft and party on their flying visit of inspection of the Canal. He was at all times in immediate personal touch with the President. In no better way can the public gain a clear idea of this, the greatest project of modern times, than through the lens of the moving picture camera. The President and party were followed in every movement of inspection, at festivities offered in their honor, as well as in private enjoyment on shipboard.

The engineering work alone of the Panama Canal is worthy of first attention from exhibitors and the public, but when this is coupled with the presence of the Chief Executive of the United States the pictures have an inestimable value. It is something that has not been filmed before and will not be filmed again under the same circumstances. The "meeting of the waters," showing the mammoth locks, display man's wonderful skill in the present age, while the grand military pageant is the first of its kind in Panama under American rule.

As President Taft leaves the White House on March 4, the Panama Canal inspection promises to be his last big official act. Aside from the features mentioned, this series of films embraces life on the American battleship, native vegetation of the Canal Zone, customs and industries of the people, and tropical scenery.

The films begin with President Taft's departure from Washington December 19, over the Atlantic Coast Line, and end with his return to the same capital city on December 31. No important event has been omitted, while many sidelights have been added which give a personal touch that always delights the spectators.

It is the intention of Mr. Simons to make these pictures educational, historical, political and topical. The Panama Canal is a subject everyone is discussing and reading about, and now the Feature Film Manufacturing Company gives the moving picture patrons an opportunity of seeing what all this means to the American nation especially, and the world at large.

In order not to delay these pictures, Manager H. M. Crandall will have these reels ready for the market by January 6. The Panama Canal pictures will be a feature for the patrons of every theatre and one that should not be overlooked by the exhibitor.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

Mr. Schulberg's Opinion

MR. B. P. SCHULBERG, is well known as a script editor and picture-play author. Formerly with the Rex Company, he was transferred recently to the Imp Films Company's script department He has resigned that position to become publicity manager and adapter of famous plays for the motion picture for the Famous Players Film Company. He is well and favorably known to the army of picture playwrights, who will be pleased to learn of his rapid strides in the profession. Here is Mr. Schulberg's opinion of the "schools" for script writers:

> In my opinion, the "associations," "institutes," "colleges," etc., are a serious menace to the entire industry. From direct and regretted experience, I am absolutely convinced that there is not one of these "institutes" in the country, the directors or instructors of which can write a successful scenario. I have had hundreds of scripts submitted by these "experts" that lacked the first suggestion of technique and that were deplorably deficient in theme and plot. It is a genuine surprise to me that these "schools" have been permitted to exist until now, and manufacturers and writers should co-operate for their mutual benefit and stamp out the lying evil. The "schools" qualifications for teaching script writing are absolutely absurd, and their usual pretension of being in direct touch with the manufacturers is based only on the gullibility of the public. They never received as much consideration from the manufacturer as the individual writer, and today they receive a great deal less, when they are considered at all. There is no question that in time they will accomplish their own ruin, but it is the duty of every ambitious scenario writer and every manufacturer to accelerate that happy day as much as lies in their power.

We have waged an unceasing campaign against these correspondence "schools" because we believe it has been our duty so to do. We have, during the past few months, quoted the highest authorities on the subject, and, without an exception, they have scored the "institutes" and "professors." We believe we have accomplished our share of the work of informing the script writers of the true state of affairs, and if they continue to spend their hard-earned money with these "grafters," it will be surely their own fault. While some publications, professedly high-class, have continued to accept the advertisements of the "colleges" for script writers, the most widely circulated publications in this country have barred the misleading advertisements. We refer to the Curtis Publishing Company. We have watched carefully for some months to see if any of these "schools" have gained entrance to the advertising columns of the Saturday Evening Post and Ladies' Home Journal, and are pleased to state that no such advertisements have appeared. Mr. Schulberg's suggestion that manufacturers and script writers should co-operate for their mutual advantage and stamp out the evil, is well taken, and we would be pleased to see some activity along this line. We volunteer to help the good cause by every means in our power.

The Sub-title.

The sub-title question continues to be discussed pro and con. We reiterate our statement of "the fewer sub-titles the better." We give some thoughts from Mr. A. R. Kennedy, of the Photoplay Author, on the sub-title question.

"The leader is placed between scenes, immediately preceding the scene it explains. Sometimes it is placed in the middle of a scene, immediately preceding the bit of action it explains. Theoretically, there is a good deal to be said for the latter arrangement. Some say it is wrong to begin a scene with a leader unless the beginning of the scene requires explanation To a certain extent the action is anticipated and the effect thereby spoiled But scenes are so short that, except in extraordinary cases, this point can safely be ignored. Here, as in every other part of picture play writing, the author must use his common sense.

"On the other hand, there is much to be said against throwing a leader into the middle of a scene. The spectator gets the effect of the actors 'holding the pose' while he reads the leader. One often has a feeling of irritation at having a scene interrupted, and when the scene is resumed it often takes an appreciable time to readjust one's mind. The continuity of the scene is broken and the illusion is spoiled.

"Leaders are also for the purpose—secondary to their explanatory function—of marking a lapse of time. A scene may require no explanation and, while it is showing it may become evident that some time has elapsed since the time of the preceding scene, and yet an odd and puzzling effect is produced unless a leader is interposed. It may be merely three words, 'A Year Later,' or something of that sort. A leader is particularly needed where two successive scenes are shown in the same setting. Indeed, in this case, the "drop curtain effect" is absolutely necessary.

"The following suggestions are offered:

"Never use a leader unless you have to.

"Do not omit leaders that are necessary to make the action clear or to indicate lapses of time.

"Make your leaders as short as possible. Long leaders are a bore and take up valuable space."

And we might add the suggestion to the writer to never begin his picture play action with a sub-title. If one becomes absolutely necessary in the first scene, break the scene. The day is coming when there will be no sub-titles in picture plays.

Convincing Stationery

We receive hundreds of letters monthly from picture playwrights and others. Some of the authors use stationery upon which is printed the names of the produced scripts of which they are authors. It is a convincing and attractive idea.

The Magazine Makers

The publishers of The Magazine Makers announce that the script department of that publication is now under the charge of Russell E. Smith, said to be a successful writer, together with Herbert C. Hoagland, of Pathe Freres.

Impossible Scripts

The impossible scripts are becoming more numerous because of the activities of the correspondence schools. The following paragraph taken from one recently submitted script shows why it was rejected.

"The next beautiful scene is laid in the orchard. Mary and John are swinging in the hammock, spooning, while two little calves, playing in the backkground, add to the effect of the scene."

Editor C. B. Hoadley received a script not long ago in which a goat was cast for an important part. It is said that Editor Hoadley felt that he was the goat for being obliged to wade through the script Use good common sense in writing picture plays or do not write them.

Chases and Accidents

Picture playwrights should avoid chases, accidents and loss of memory ideas when evolving scripts. The power of suggestion is great and many would-be writers after viewing a large number of picture plays in which the above mentioned ideas play important parts, go straight home and follow suit. Be original. Write "something different." Because the public is inflicted with the deadly triangle and the festive "loss of memory" plots, there is no reason why you should endeavor to add to the number.

Art of Condensation

Mr. A. W. Thomas, of the Photoplay Magazine, writes as follows:

"We believe that while condensation is preferable, the writer should be allowed to write his story in a more lengthy form if by so doing he can add to the value of the plot as the editor may grasp it. Not all writers can condense a story into six or seven hundred words; not all can intelligently write a synopsis of less than three hundred words, so we think the author should be permitted to 'have his own way' in the writing of picture plays so long as good judgment is used. We don't mean to advocate that a writer should submit a young novel but we feel as if many an author, just starting into the picture play game, could be encouraged if they were allowed to write in their own way. It would take only a few lessons (not from "schools") and a little advice to get them into the proper groove whereby they could cut down on words and apply the technique of the studio."

The argument is very well put. However, the art of condensation is one of the arts that contribute to the profession of picture play writing. Mr. Thomas is a former newspaper man and he knows that brevity is the soul of wit and also of strength. When the knack of writing comprehensive and terse script synopses is learned, many scripts will be read more carefully. An editor, be he newspaper editor or script editor, approaches a wordy essay gingerly. He is prejudiced somewhat before he gets a good start. Any writer can say a great deal in three or four hundred words, if he knows how to do it.

The Right Idea

The script editor for Kinemacolor has the right idea. Prompt readings and courteous rejections for unavailable scripts seem the rule in the Kinemacolor script department. The writers appreciate it.

Perseverance

We have often advocated sturdy perseverance. It surely conquers all things, even the script editor. However, perseverance must be accompanied by a certain amount of talent and also common sense. Script writing is the best training in the literary world of to-day. It teaches the plot, action, color, some style and condensation, all essential to those who would succeed in any literary walk of life. So the persevering script writer is, perhaps, unconsciously training himself for higher things. Louis Reeves Harrison recently wrote something along this line which pleased us. In fact, most of the articles from the pen of Mr. Harrison please us. We take the liberty of quoting a paragraph from this particular article:

> Those who stick to it will meet with success in varied forms. One thing they get rid of is the popular notion that there is such an enormous amount of ignorance in the world that they can hold the attention of a vast audience numbering millions with what is deplorably stupid or merely stale. The author who is going to amount to something keeps writing in spite of modest remuneration and remote appreciation until he strikes his true gait. It may be that what is new to him is old to others, and he has to find this out before he is really able to entertain and instruct in delightful combination. He may have to spoil a bushel of scenarios before he is able to get at the true value of what he is attempting or before he really produces something original in such nice proportions that it will make a hit.
> Success of the highest kind is in store for those who master all the technical difficulties, who study the exposition of a screen story from every point of view, who try to attain perfection of structure and characterization, who trust to their own inventive powers and observation, who depend upon original work rather than servile imitation of what has already been done to death. First learn things, then be a revealer of them. Picture play scenarios are not the only things that a gifted author may write, though they afford a fine training school for those aspiring to composition.

Wasting Your Time

In answer to quite a number of inquiries we say: "Do not waste your time trying to write picture plays from published novels. Addressing the owner of the copyright will do you no good nine times out of ten. Be your own originator."

WM. LORD WRIGHT.

A STORY OF A SICILIAN HEROINE

Ambrosio Special Feature

This story first takes you to Missilmeri, a little Sicilian village, and into the home of Don Ruggero, a wealthy land owner. Don Ruggero is an iron-hearted man and strongly prejudiced against the lower classes.

His son, Corrado, a young fellow, loves Rosalia, a shepherdess, but Don Ruggero has always refused to allow their marrage and to recognize little Vincenzino, their child, as his grandchild. Finally to destroy all Corrado's hopes, he discharges poor Rosalia from his farm, where she had been employed for many years. Even the sight of her departure with Vincenzino in her arms does not soften him.

Rosalia is the very ideal of the Sicilian beauty, and Captain Altieri, an officer in the service of the Dominators, the Bourbons, admires her immensely, but all his approaches are strongly repulsed by her.

Don Ruggero and his son have for a long time conspired to free their motherland from the hands of the Bourbons, and when they receive news of the arrival of Garibaldi, who had sailed with only 1,000 soldiers from Quarto near Genoa to fight for the freedom of Sicily, they leave their village to join him and the other conspirators. The rendezvous is at Piana dei Greci, where they find Garibaldi just starting out to conquer Palermo.

In the meantime Captain Altieri steals from Rosalia her little son, hoping thus to succeed in his vile scheme, and starts out to join the Bourbons' headquarters in Marineo near Corleone. Colonel Bosco, the commander-in-chief of the Bourbon army, entrusts Captain Altieri with an important message to be delivered to the almost doomed Palermo.

Altieri starts out, and on this way meets Rosalia, who implores him for the restoration of her child. Upon the sight of her, he forgets his important mission and drags her into an uninhabited house, where he has concealed Vincenzino in an upper room. The little boy, hearing the cries of his mother, rushes down to save her and drops some ashes into the eyes of her aggressor. Taking advantage of his instantaneous blindness, she steals the message Altieri had with him and runs away to Garibaldi's headquarters.

Her courageous act meets with high approval from Garibaldi, and wins for her the consent of Don Ruggero to her long-delayed marriage to Corrado.

CLEVELAND, O., Dec. 23.—Well, in the words of the prophet, "it has came." I told you so, counts for nothing, although the author of this article has repeatedly sounded the warning against the "blood and thunder" feature film. Only a short while ago, we earnestly urged those manufacturers who persisted in flooding the market with "penny dreadful" stuff, and accompanying the releases with sensational posters, to have a care for the sake of Cinematography.

Then Mayor Baker, of Cleveland, put on the lid

Cleveland, from the exhibitors' viewpoint, is the heart and soul of the moving picture realm. There are hundreds of pretty theatres in the Forest City and several of the national officers of the National Exhibitors' League reside in this pretty city. The "Sixth City" has taken pride in its picture theatres, the personnel of its exhibitors, and of the fact that the Cleveland Daily Leader and the Cleveland Daily News devote much space to the moving picture. The Sunday Leader, in fact, devotes a well-edited page to Finland, and has hastened to the assistance of the sorely-tried picture exhibitor in his time of duress. With the clever cartoons of Ole May, the versatile pens of Ralph D. Stoddard and John Markham, these newspapers have stood staunchly for the moving picture theatre. The Plain Dealer, official political organ of the administration, is "on the fence."

* * * *

Mayor Baker, of Cleveland, is the political heir of the late Tom L. Johnson. Like Johnson used to do, he smokes a big pipe and, unlike Johnson, he follows the vogue of Thomas Beddings and quotes, or misquotes, Greek and Latin. Hence, it will be seen that he is a theorist.

Mayor Baker is suppressing moving pictures that show crimes. In this, one of the many reforms he has attempted, he is undoubtedly sincere, even if impractical, and without thorough knowledge of a great and important source of entertainment. He has a big enough mind to appreciate the danger to youth of pictures portraying crime. He has his eyes open and sees the influence of these things. However, he has made the mistake in becoming ever-enthusiastic, in his crusade and trusting to the discriminative powers of a doubtful police chief and aides as official censors. A very common and sad error.

The admission price to the picture shows is low and the children attend in vast numbers. On their tender minds a picture of crime or impurity impresses itself and leaves a scar that will stay all their lives. They should be protected. If parents are careless about these things, public authority should not be. The picture show is too interesting an affair to be left unguarded, and it can be kept interesting and at the same time decent, with a little care. We ought to keep out of the underworld altogether. There is enough of beauty and interest and delight above ground to make a picture show very attractive and remunerative. This has been the viewpoint of this writer for several years, and time is proving that his belief is a correct one.

However, when there is censoring to be done, let those having a knowledge of music, art and the drama; those broadminded enough to be sincerely discriminative; those having at least a liberal education in elevating and moral things, do the censoring—not some police chief, who has been on trial for delinquency in office, nor a desk sergeant whose knowledge of literature or art is bounded by the green lights of a police station.

As the result of Mayor Baker's campaign against films depicting crime, six exhibitors were arrested and brought into court. Among them were several women. Members of the Exhibitors' League then adopted resolutions abolishing posters from their theatres and asking the city to enforce the order at all picture theatres. They believe lurid posters are responsible for the mayor's crusade. Exhibitors are right when they assert that posters frequently exaggerate the films as greatly as circus sideshow banners exaggerate the peculiarities of the attractions inside the tent.

Chief of Police Kohler converted himself into a self-appointed motion picture film censor, of course. They all do it. Last week he ordered "The Burglar and the Rose," parts of "The Fugitive," and "The Crooked Path," suppressed. "Unamusing, uninteresting and poor entertainment," was the chief's criticism of "The Burglar and the Rose." Every day he proposes to censor films in a courtroom. Motion picture exhibitors and exchange men will co-operate to the extent of bringing films to Kohler when they are in doubt, and showing them free to him. Genial Samuel Bullock represents the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League at the censorship parties.

* * * *

Nothing objectonable was found in 'The Invaders," but the chief requested a ban on outside posters depicting the battle. "My Hero" passed unchallenged. "Babes in the Wood" was approved, but Kohler refused to pass judgment on "The Heart of a Red Man." "I have no objection to war scenes or a little gun action," said Kohler. In "The Compact," there is the character of a drug fiend, and the chief ordered parts of this picture eliminated. "The suggestive scenes are the ones we want eliminated." The Exhibitors' League members say they will abide by Mayor Baker's mandates, and film exchange managers are being trusted to send in for censorship all films regarding which they are in doubt.

The following item appearing in Cleveland newspapers several weeks ago is said to have started the row:

> "We saw it done at a moving picture show," was the explanation of John Quigley, thirteen years old, 4057 East Ninety-third street, and Edward Blake, fourteen years old, 9324 Harvard avenue, when they were called before Probation Officer Lewis yesterday on an unofficial charge of holding up a man with knives.
> "Councilman Zinner Monday offered an ordinance in council making it an offense punishable by fine to display films portraying crimes or bloodshed."

The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League is said to be in favor of the Zinner ordinance, but the members rightly protest bitterly against police supervision of their theatres. The mayor and police refuse to relinquish their "investigation" of moving picture theatres despite the new arrangement to have all pictures censored and the elimination of posters pursuant to a resolution reading as follows: Resolved, that members of Cleveland local, No. 1, M. P. E. L., refrain from using posters, three sheets, six sheets, eight sheets or any similar pictorial display advertising on the outside of their theatres. It is further provided, however, that this resolution shall not prevent any exhibitor from displaying the title of his film subjects by lettered signs, banners or otherwise when lettering conforms with the story depicted.

* * * *

"One of the most dangerous and inexcusable infringements of popular rights seems now to be under full swing in Cleveland, where the mayor is empowered to stop any picture show which portrays crime," Root wrote.

"Since when has the portrayal of crime been a crime? Throughout the whole gamut of art the illustrations of crime and murder have played an important part, and nobody as yet has raised any objection, although Mayor Baker may change our views in regard to the matter. That these views suggest crime is no argument against them, especially as crime is always made repulsive and virtue attractive."

Root mentioned pictures of brutality and murder which, he said, are shown in illustrated Bibles.

Victor O. Woodward, manager of a Sandusky (O.) theatre, held different opinions. He said the future of the moving picture theatre lies in the success of such campaigns as Mayor Baker is making. Until last September Woodward was general manager of the Ajax Film & Supply Company, with headquarters in Cleveland.

"Some of the films exhibited in Cleveland are a disgrace to civilization," he said yesterday. "The sooner Mayor Baker and Chief Kohler succeed in their work the better it will be, not only for the people of Cleveland, but for the managers of the theatres."

Woodward said he was sorry for the exchanges that suffered financial loss by the seizure of films by Kohler.

Naming the city of Cleveland, Mayor Baker and Chief Kohler as defendants, Schwartz & Lustig, attorneys, filed injunction suits in common pleas court to prevent further seizure of films. The action was taken in the names of the General Film Company, the Lake Shore Film & Supply Company, the Warner Feature Film Company and the Victor Film Service Company.

Mr. R. P. Stoddard, picture play editor of the Cleveland Sunday Leader, comments on the situation in a logical manner. A portion of his recent arguments follows:

"Much of the criticism of local moving picture theatres resulting in the arrest of seven exhibitors during the past week comes from a lack of knowledge regarding the moving picture industry generally, and especially of the method of distributing and censoring films.

"The elimination of pictures showing crime scenes, in the broad way it was attempted, already has been unsatisfactory and several of the films, for the exhibition of which the theatre proprietors were arrested and detained at headquarters, have been returned to service and pronounced inoffensive by the officials.

"Those exhibitors who were arrested and taken from their places by patrolmen censors only to find that the film in question is perfectly proper, are martyrs to the cause, and one of them is a woman." This is the view a leading exhibitor takes of the present crusade here.

"Good is coming out of all the trouble," said another prominent exhibitor last night. "It did not seem right to arrest another exhibitor without first being certain that there was a reason, but the discussion is proving enlightening to many who formerly knew very little about that business. Had the officials known the method of censorship in practice and been familiar with the film business, I doubt if there ever would have been an arrest. Questionable films could have been taken out of service until inspected. There is a right way to get at the thing, as well as a wrong way."

The actual elimination of all crime in the broad sense attempted by the order of Mayor Baker last week would put out of service a large proportion of the film now on exhibition. If applied to the stage plays and literature it would eliminate even a larger proportion of all that is staged and printed. At the Opera House last week Otis Skinner appeared in "Kismet," undoubtedly one of the most impressive and entertaining plays ever seen here. A person would not be sane, in the opinion of those who have seen the play, if he suggested its suppression. Yet there are two murders in the play. Both are staged in an inoffensive way and Mr. Skinner is too great an artist to appear in any production that is not elevating.

It has been argued that greater caution should be exercised in censoring moving pictures than in literature or stage productions because the audience is so much greater, and this is reasonable. More children visit picture shows in any day of the year than attend the theatres in a whole year. Nothing should be shown to suggest methods of crime to them. But if the parable of the prodigal son is good for the children to hear, then a great majority of the picture plays are beneficial, for, almost without exception, there is a good lesson in every story. Wrongdoing invariably leads to punishment in the pictures.

In Cleveland, more than in most other cities, is the welfare of the picture audience safeguarded. Ninety-two out of about 110 picture theatres in the city are managed by members of Cleveland Local No. 1, Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America. It is one of the first principles of this organization to make the picture theatre uplifting and to safeguard the morals and health of the patrons. No class of residents of Cleveland are more capable of judging the effects of a picture play than the exhibitors.

Certainly none is more deeply interested in avoiding evil effects than the man whose business depends upon the good name of his show. The moving picture theatre is the people's amusement. It is the family show. The children are sent alone to the picture shows with the assurance that they will be well treated, and there is not a record of a case in Cleveland where a child has been harmed in a picture theatre.

Long before there were picture theatres boys played "Indian" and "soldier" and marched with their wooden guns or stalked through the grass to attack an imaginary foe.

To sum it all up, the row will end in favor of the exhibitors, as it should end. And the lesson to the manufacturers should be the elimination of all sensational posters and due care to the feature films. Mayor Baker has no right to intimate that the responsible exhibitors of Cleveland are devoid of decency and judgment, and neither is he of greater mind than the National Board of Censorship. More power to the Cleveland exhibitors and may they win their battle of individual liberty and fair play.

ELSIE FROLICH IN "CONQUERED"

(Great Northern Special)

Some of the most delightful acting that we have ever witnessed takes place in the Great Northern Special "Conquered," with Elsie Frolich in the lead. A splendid specimen of robust youth and physical perfection, she plays the part of the Countess Von Thule in the above mentioned production with a vim and a spontaneity that will bring moving picture audiences to her feet.

The story is all about how this apparently unconquerable young woman was conquered at last by the man she pretended not to love.

The scene of the hunt and also that of the garden party given by the Countess are never-to-be-forgotten spectacles of beauty and excitement.

The above is, to the mind of the writer, one of the finest features ever put out by the Great Northern Feature Film Co.

What An Advertising Manager Ought to Know

By JOHN B. CLYMER

Manager of Advertising and Sales, Gaumont Company

The advertising manager should know how to tell that which he is presumed to deal in so little—the truth. The period is passing when we can jimmy our way into people's purses, merely by using the lubricant of slippery, meaningless words. These words, if we are nowadays to unlock the door to the order room, must have a backbone of facts.

He should know what he is trying to market and the selling points of that product. He should "know" his readers, and whether he should talk to them in "How are you, Bill" terminology, or "So pleased to meet you, Mr. Simkins" language. His buyers are not interested in the parade of his esoteric vocabulary. They want to know what he has to sell and whether it is what they need. Unless he is writing to the Hottentots or the natives of Timbuctoo, he should know the English language. It is a good wholesome tongue, and when properly used as a type-salesman, will get the money. He should know the psychology of the eye—what is easiest conveyable by the optic nerve. In this age when printing presses are running twenty-four hours a day, one must write advertisements as readers would have them, not as they tickle his particular conceits.

He should know his media. He should know the circulation and the importance of publications to which he gives advertisements. If advertisements do not bring results in this and that media, he is wasting his company's money.

In the motion picture business an advertising manager is frequently called upon to conduct general sales. Therefore he must know the general business. If he is to censor his company's films, he should be able to judge their value, viewing them as spectators would view them, knowing exhibitors' tastes, their likes and dislikes. If he is to write titles and sub-titles, he should know the value of the "catchy" phrase and the euphony of words. He should keep the dress of his thoughts spic and span, well burnished and brushed. If he is to design lithographs, he should be able to see in his subject the essence of the story and choose for his poster the most dramatic scene or scenes.

To revert to the telling of truth in advertisements, it is not a clever trick. It is merely the utilization of the news sense. In such a business as motion pictures, where every subject is a story, it is simple. Instead of keeping a hat full of adjectives and putting one's hand into it and pulling out a dozen or so indiscriminately, and then tacking to his subject "marvelous," "wonderful," "great," "stupendous," "extraordinary," etc., he can take his story and focus attention on its salient points. If he is to do this, he must know his goods.

He must be able to see selling points. If he is not mentally blind, they will leap at him and the only way that he can evade them is by going to sleep. Even then he is likely to dream of them. Talking points are mountains of merit which cover the needs of his buyers. They may cover matters of service, quality or of price. Upon the skill of the salesman either in oral or in written language to exploit his talking points, his sales records hinge. As to the appeal to the motion picture exhibitor or State Rights buyer, his advertisements should tell honestly what his subjects contain. States' Rights pictures are usually purchased on the strength of one or more exciting scenes. Tell of these things. There are degrees in the success with which they are told. There are words which express dramatic action. The advertising man should be as fastidious in his choice of terms as he is in the choice of a wife.

Knowing the English language is a matter of education. If he has not education, he should get it. It not only means a knowledge of grammar, syntax, punctuation and rhetoric, but a delicate sensibility to word values. He should be able to write to the ear as well as to the eye and the intelligence. There are infinite ways of arranging a sentence to bring out the force of its thought. Every student of rhetoric knows that the beginning and the ending of a sentence and a paragraph should be the strongest. The less important thoughts should be expressed in the middle, where they are more or less submerged. There is a trick in the arrangement of adjectives, which, by the way, should be used sparingly. That trick lies in putting the adjective after the noun it qualifies, which throws the accent upon the adjective. In the motion picture business a large vocabulary of verbs is needed. They are action words. Their shades of strength and meaning are worth knowing. If we always write our advertisements in high C, the ear and the eye will become tired of the strain. When there is really something strong to be expressed, the writer will be unable to give it emphasis, because he has given matters of minor importance that emphasis, and accordingly it will read and sound just like the rest.

The advertisement writer, if he writes the other literature of the company, including synopses, house organ, etc., to gain the ability to turn out a large amount of work, should be able to dictate his matter. If he has to bow his shoulders over a typewriter and painfully with two fingers laboriously peck away at his "stuff," he will not be able to accomplish much work. He should so train his mind that he can talk his writings and then polish them after the stenographer has worked her worst upon them.

The motion picture business makes no severe demands upon an advertisement writer. His readers are usually good, workaday people, who read his synopses, etc., to learn what is going on and what they can get for their money. Therefore, the manner of handling motion picture advertising has become stereotyped and his originality lies mainly along lines of novel "make-up."

Regarding the appeal to the eye, the advertising man must realize that the eye is much worked, and if we are to gain its attention and then the serious consideration of the intellect, whose agent the eye is, we must print that which we know the eye will have a bias for reading, and to print it in such a way that the owner of the eye will not have to wear spectacles. It is a tendency in modern advertising to use abundant "white space," which means leaving liberal margins around the printed text. Heavy banks of small or large black type frighten the eye. It unconsciously seeks that reading matter whose type is large and clear.

The advertising manager in the motion picture business is also a "press agent," that pretty word which Walter J. Kingsley so valiantly defends in a current magazine. He must know how to prepare stories which trade-papers will print free of charge. This publicity is used sometimes as a courtesy to the advertiser, on account of the money which the advertiser spends with that paper. While the trade paper editor is good-natured, yet we cannot impose on his good nature and publicity matter should at least be well written. It should also be worth printing. It should have news value.

The advertising-press agent should be able to dig into his news happenings company and his subjects and extract all the news stories. On these news stories he can frequently "hang" other matter, which otherwise the paper would have no excuse for printing. It is to invent this excuse for printing stories in papers that causes a press agent to run his hands through his hair.

There are innumerable sources of stories, and the personal element is always prominent. News is largely composed of happenings which are new. If his company does some new or old thing in a new way, it is often worth writing about. He will do well, however, not to sing pæans of praise in preparing these stories as they are not then good reading and inform the reader that the story is really an advertisement in disguise. This causes the story to lose worth.

A pressagent can rarely excell unless he has worked on a newspaper, as his eye should be trained to see news from the newspaper editor's standpoint, so that he can prepare it properly. If he has ever worked on the "copydesk" of a newspaper, he will understand the art of condensation and the ability to tell a story swiftly, succinctly and tersely. Publicity is valuable. Upon his ability to obtain as much of this "free space" as the limits of their columns will allow, rests his value as a pressagent. If he can so write it that it will be entertaining to the readers, acting as a subtle boost for his company, that value will be doubled.

AN INTERESTING STATEMENT BY MADAME ALICE BLACHE OF THE SOLAX COMPANY

Madame Alice Blache president of the Solax Motion Picture Company, known as the only woman of prominence manufacturing and producing moving pictures, and the pioneer in the production of grand opera in motion pictures, said in discussing the Dowling amendment to the Folks ordinance placing all films under the supervision of the Board of Education:

"Before making serious changes the manufacturers of films should be given an opportunity to be heard. A board of censorship should be composed, in addition to the members of the Board of Education, of practical business men and film manufacturers. The exercise of a rigid censorship would work considerable harm, and a reaction after too much censorship is likely to ruin the industry."

In discussing children and moving pictures, because the attendance of children at picture shows makes censorship necessary, she said:

"Twenty school children, not one of them above the age of fourteen, accompanied by their teacher visited the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York City on a Sunday afternoon not very long ago. The class consisted of boys and girls. The children were of the type one sees in the recreation centers and playgrounds in the tenement sections of a cosmopolitan city. They were bright children and shuffled through the corridors of the marble museum with eyes full of inquiry and minds making mental photographs of the wonderful collections on exhibit. The zigzag line of these impressionable youngsters eventually filed into the large hall where are exhibited wonderful works from the sculptor's chisel.

"The kids regarded the nude statues with a peculiar surprise. Some were embarrassed, and faced the teacher with somewhat averted eyes. The teacher, who understood children,—not because she had any of her own, but because she had not forgotten her own childhood—took in the situation, and with tact managed to put the children at their ease. She made plain to them the difference between vulgar nakedness and nude art. As an example, she pointed to Rodin's Pygmalion and Galatea, and she told them the charming legend of the statue that came to life. The story told by the teacher immediately cloaked Galatea's nude figure with poetry. It made them forget sexual outline, and evicted from their minds any sex-consciousness.

"These same children, and thousands like them attend moving picture shows. Those who know children at all, know that the children of 'the other half' are wise in the ways of the world, and in life itself, and have a surprising knowledge of human nature,—more knowledge than their years would indicate. These children read the sensational newspapers with the avidity that they observe sensational moving picture films. The high average of child attendance at the moving picture shows and the diversity of opinion with regard to the influence for evil certain pictures have on the juvenile mind, makes the task of the film producers a rather difficult one. If manufacturers were to follow the advice of old maids,—who of course, understand the bringing up of children—and male tea-drinkers—the market would be crowded with nothing but fairy stories. The triangular plot and stories of real life would be taboo. It is sometimes wondered whether it is at all possible for a film of the type of 'The Wages of Sin,' etc., to influence a child in the ways of righteousness and steer it on to the straight and narrow path. Is it not at all possible that a film exercises the same influence as that teacher exercised over her children at the museum? Or is it impossible because the self-constituted bodies who superintend the public morals, can see nothing in creations like Pygmalion and Galatea but vulgar nakedness?

"The trouble with most well-meaning meddlers who undertake to prescribe for children of their neighbors is that they forget that they have been children themselves. They forget that they have resisted as many temptations, and perhaps more than their parents. And they forget that their children with proper home influences or good influences at the schools will resist as many temptations as they have resisted in their childhood. There is a difference of opinion as to whether the picture shows will counteract the influence of the school and home. To go exhaustively into the merits of films manufactured to-day would mean considerable discussion—but narrowing the question as far as films affect juvenile delinquency, is it not a matter of opinion as to whether children really commit the same crimes that they see in moving pictures? In pictures the criminals are invariably punished. Can we not find any other reason for the juvenile delinquency except the one that it is caused by the sight of an overt act which the children try to emulate? Is it not reasonable to assume that the schools and colleges have failed in their missions if children cannot be taken to a moving picture show, and be shown a burglar entering a house without arousing in them the desire to commit a similar crime? The ostrich that digs its head in the sand to evade capture, feeling a mistaken security in darkness, usually is surprised to find itself captured. Its own ignorance is its undoing. By shutting our eyes against the evils that exist in this world, we will not succeed in eliminating these evils. They exist and will exist, and the more we talk about them, the more they are discussed, the more apt are we to correct them. Hypocrites and the 'I am holier than thou' element are not the kind who help society.

"Because they lived in darkness and in ignorance, do we call those who lived centuries before us primitive?

"At this time, when pictures are being shown in schools and colleges, and when the classics and exact scientific operations are flashed on the screen, when real dramas and operas are shown with more effectiveness and realism than on the legitimate stage, it is about time folks stopped to throw the harpoon into the hide of the moving picture manufacturers; it is about time that a real board of censorship is legislated into power; not a board composed of raw college students, tea-drinkers, and old maids, but a board composed of mothers, fathers, practical men and women who are paid by the commonwealth to do a public service, to stamp out absolute immorality and absolute vulgarity that is flashed on the screens solely to entertain the morbid. There's a marked difference between matters of 'taste' and 'immorality.' Manufacturers welcome criticism and censorship, but they will not tolerate the vagaries of meddling hypocrites."

A FAIRYLAND BRIDE

By VIRGINIA WEST

(Adapted from Reliance Release)

I WON'T go West among all those consumptives; I simply will not."

The speaker was young Philip Gray, who lay propped upon pillows.

"But, my dear fellow, you don't have to go among those people. You can be entirely away from them. I have told you that you have not tuberculosis but you have had a very severe attack of pneumonia and your lungs are in a very weakened condition. I want you to take every precaution, that is all. If you don't I'll not answer for the consequences."

"But I'd as soon die one way as another. If I go out there I'll surely die of loneliness. It must be awful. I've often pitied those poor devils away from all their friends with nothing to do but think about their health. It's terrible. I'd much rather stay home and die, thank you."

Doctor Andrews frowned and nibbled his finger-nails.

"Well," he said finally, "will you go into the country near home somewhere? Some place where you can get plenty of milk and eggs?"

"I don't want to," said the sick man. "I don't want to at all. How long would you want me to stay?"

"Three or four months at the least. If you did exactly as I told you probably—very probably—you would not have to stay any longer."

"Well, it's just like pulling eye-teeth to make myself go, but I reckon it's a man's duty to keep from dying if he can—darn it. What on earth did I want to get pneumonia for, like an idiotic mollycoddle?"

"Stronger men than you have had it," Doctor Andrews assured him, "and for less cause."

"Well, I'll go to your everlasting farmhouse, but I'm not going to talk about it."

Philip Gray turned over in bed as a sign that the conversation was closed.

"All right," said the Doctor, "I'm content—for the present. I'll find just the right place and have you bundled off before you know it."

A grunt came from the bed.

In a week young Gray was settled at a farmhouse about ten miles away. His room opened onto an upstairs side porch, where he spent most of his time, day and night.

The surrounding country was beautiful. The view to be had from the porch was as much as anyone could ask for. Broad, green meadows spread out before him, with wooded hills beyond. To one side a wood hid a little dell through which ran a sparkling stream from the hills. Gray could hear its murmur from his porch as it came to him in the daytime, mingled with the love-songs of the birds and at night the calling of the crickets.

The farmer and his wife were kindly country-born folk and took a sincere pleasure in doing all they could to make things easy and pleasant for the young man.

The fare was excellent and abundant. The air was pure and bracing, and the water was as clear and pure as crystal.

All these things were so, and yet Philip Gray was restless and unhappy. It is not an easy thing for a naturally active young man who has been used to the hustle of a city to suddenly find himself alone on a farm save for two kindly but uncongenial people.

Doctor Andrews came out to see his patient every few days, both to watch his progress and to try to cheer him up. The latter effort was almost fruitless. He used every means he knew of without avail, and then the doctor began to look troubled. He was interested in Gray not only as a patient he had pulled through a severe illness, but as a friend. He had grown more than ordinarily fond of the young man and he was anxious to see him improve rapidly.

"I must find a way to cheer him up," he said to himself. "If something doesn't do it mighty soon, he'll be a dead man in two months and I'll stake my reputation on it."

Before Doctor Andrews called again something happened.

One morning, when the sun had climbed just high enough to peep over the railing of Gray's sleeping porch and shine straight into his eyes, he sat up and yawned as he listened for a moment to a pair of robins discussing housekeeping in an apple tree nearby.

He thought he would lie down again and take another nap. Just as he was about to do so his eye lighted upon a small white object beneath the railing. It had writing upon it and looked like an informal note. Life had been too monotonous to Gray not to be interested. He got out of bed and captured the little note. For it was a note.

"Mr. Philip Gray," was written in what certainly looked like a feminine hand.

He looked inside with a curiosity any woman might be proud of. What he read was. "Isn't this going to be a perfectly grand day?"

A sense of the grandness of the day came over Gray even before he wondered how the note came there and by whom it was written. Who in the world could it be?

As soon as he could dress he was downstairs interviewing Mrs. Judson. She knew absolutely nothing about it, she said.

"It must 'a ben a fairy, Mr. Gray. There's them what's seen 'em in Dingle Dell, they say."

The next morning when Gray awoke the first thing he did was to look toward the spot where the note was found. There lay another one. He sprang out of bed with an energy that surprised him.

"The robins in your apple tree are expecting a family in a few days."

All day Gray found himself glancing toward the apple tree. He had been too busy before, thinking about himself to notice the robins. Now he even went so far as to keep an eye on the cat when she went near the tree.

Several days passed without a sign from the unknown visitor Gray was beginning to call the "fairy."

Then, one morning he found a bunch of wild orchids with the dew still on them.

How the things got onto the particular spot where they were was what puzzled Gray most. He thought about it so much that he forgot himself.

When Doctor Andrews came again to see him he was amazed.

"Well, well," he said, "you look as though you were taking some interest in life. What's happened?"

"Nothing," answered Gray with as unconcerned and bored expression as he could summon.

But the doctor knew better and when he went downstairs he had a long conversation with Mrs. Judson.

The next note said: "Did you ever see the ferns growing in the old well below the barn? They are beautiful. Better come and see them."

That was a longer distance than Gray had walked yet, but that afternoon he made the venture and walked to the old well.

When he looked into the cool depths he half expected to see a nymph looking up at him. But he only saw his own reflection far away down in the bottom.

Then "The apples by the stile are just ripe. They're fine.' With this was a bunch of wood-lilies.

When Gray first looked toward them he thought he saw a slight movement. He jumped out of bed and ran to the railing. As he looked down into the yard he thought he saw the flash of a bright head as some one went around the corner of the house. But Mrs. Judson knew nothing when questioned.

These things went on and on. Gray saw enough to know that the "Fairy" was evidently a very attractive human fairy.

The notes led him on to take longer and longer walks each day until the old doctor was overjoyed.

As Philip grew stronger, stronger also grew his desire to see this unknown girl and to know why she was being so kind to him.

At last he determined to find out the secret. He arose at dawn and went quietly downstairs. Hiding himself, he waited.

The girl came and his heart beat fast at the sight of her.

Cautiously she stooped and drew from under the porch an ingeniously contrived instrument composed of two long sticks with a spring. With these she very deftly placed a note in the accustomed place.

When the sticks were replaced the young man stepped forth and said:

"Good morning."

The girl was away like a frightened doe. The man forgot his weakness and remembering only his new found strength, he gave chase.

Away they went, she far in advance at first but he rapidly gaining upon her. Near and nearer he came until finally she made one dash for the wood and down into the dell. He was determined. The instinct of the primitive man arose in him and he forgot that he had been ill, only conscious of the wild, unrestrained, sweet desire to catch this woman who ran from him.

He gained upon her, and as he saw her strength lessening, he put forth all he had, and then she faltered and his arms closed around her.

In the moment of triumph he was defeated, for he had used his strength to the utmost. Before he could speak he lay upon the ground at the girl's feet.

When Gray came to himself he found that he was still in Dingle Dell but was wrapped in a blanket as snugly as though he had been in his bed.

When he left he fastened a note to the tree under which he lay, asking the "Fairy" to meet him there the next day. In the morning he found a note saying that she would do so.

Then the notes and flowers were replaced by meetings; smiles took the place of encouraging words.

They became good friends, taking long walks and having many talks together as good friends should.

One day, when the shadows lay a little softer than usual in Dingle Dell, and the trees whispered a little more secretly, and the brook murmured a little more confidingly, on this day Philip Gray said to the "Fairy": You have saved my life, what do you wish to do with it?"

And the "Fairy," being only human after all—and a woman—looked at the flowers at her feet and was silent.

"My life is yours," continued the man, "You must tell me what to do with it."

Then she said in a voice that only the shadows and the trees and the brook could hear: "Keep it for me—always."

And even if the man couldn't hear he know anyway, for he was a human lover in Fairyland.

The "Fairy" promised to be married soon if she might have her own way entirely in arranging matters.

Of course the consent was given. The main points in the affair were that the marriage was to take place in Dingle Dell and that Philip was to wear a bandage over his eyes until after the ceremony.

Now, you must remember that Philip did not know the name of his fairy bride. He cared nothing about that. She had made him well and he loved her. That was enough.

He consented to the conditions and the wedding took place in the presence, as Philip supposed, of only Mr. and Mrs. Judson and the minister.

But when the blindfold was removed, great was Philip's surprise to find himself surrounded with many real live human beings.

He blinked and rubbed his eyes a little and then uttered a few exclamations. Around him stood his best friends from the city, and prominent among them—in fact most prominent—was Doctor Andrews.

Before Gray could say a word the Doctor took the bride by the hand and said: "Allow me to introduce my daughter."

"Your what?" exclaimed Philip.

"Yes, my daughter. I sent her out here to a neighboring farmhouse in order that she might cheer you up I told her to use her own methods and she did. That's the whole story."

"BIG JOHN" SANTA CLAUS

By Captain Jack Crawford, "The Poet Scout."

THE poor woman was in despair. The theatrical company with which she had left Denver for a tour of the mountain towns, had been wrecked upon the rocks of bad business, the manager had fled, and Mrs. Maynard, his leading woman, known on the bills as Etta Baker, sat in the cheerless mining camp hotel, her eyes red with weeping and her brain almost distracted. Her trunks, with others, were held in the stage office for the fares of the company from the last stand, her purse was empty, and she trembled at every approaching footstep, fearing it might be that of the rough-speaking landlord coming to give her notice that she must vacate the room.

Mrs Maynard was a widow with one child, a bright little flaxen-haired girl, who had a child s part in the play. Her husband was an apparently well-to-do man, and at their home in an eastern city they lived in peace and plenty until that dread destroyer, pneumonia, left her a widow at the age of twenty-one. After the burial of her husband she learned to her consternation that his debts largely exceeded his property holdings, and ere her grief had been blunted by the hand of time she found herself homeless and penniless. In the days of her girlhood she had taken a prominent part in amateur theatricals, and her talent had gained for her well-merited recognition in the columns of the press of her city. When left alone in the world and compelled to earn a livelihood for herself and little daughter, her thoughts naturally turned toward the stage, and she joined a company bound across the continent to tour the Pacific States. At Denver she was taken ill and was obliged to remain there is a hospital until her recovery, and when she regained her health, an irresponsible manager secured her services with the result above named.

The weather was bitterly cold and the small sheet iron stove in the cheerless room occupied by the mother and daughter seemed incompetent to battle with the keen temperature which penetrated the thin board walls of the uncouth structure dignified with the name "The Cosmopolitan Hotel." The partition walls which separated the apartments were of unbleached muslin stretched over the joists; eye-proof, but not ear-proof.

Midget, as the wee daughter was called, sat near the stove with a shawl thrown over her delicate shoulders to protect them from the cold. Looking up into her mother's tearful eyes she said:

"Mamma, please don't cry, for it makes me feel awful bad to see your tears. I am sure God will not forget us. Every time I woke last night I prayed to Him to take care of us and after I had prayed I felt so good and happy, just as if I had heard Him whisper to me that He had heard my prayers and would answer them."

"Bless your trusting little heart, you are a great comfort to me," the mother replied. "But for your sweet, cheering words I would feel like giving up all hope and praying to the Lord to take us both up to your angel papa. We have only heaven to look to in our troubles, dear, and we should not lose faith in the Savior, whose birth will be celebrated all over the Christian world tomorrow."

"Oh, mamma, is tomorrow Chris——"

The little one had looked up with a hopeful glance, then, as she checked the speech upon her lips, her eyes drooped and a shadow of pain crept over her face. The mother caught the changing expressions on the little one's features and her heart swelled almost to bursting and the tears flowed anew from her swollen eyes.

"O, mamma, don't," Midget pleaded. "I don't care a snap for Santa Claus and won't hang up a single stocking, for I know he would never come to look for me in this faraway place. He will look for me back home, and, when he finds I am not there he will give my presents to some poor little girl."

"Yes, you do care, Midget, darling, but in your brave little soul you try to hide your disappointment that it may not grieve mamma I fear darling, that the good Santa will not find you this time."

"Don't you mind it a bit, mamma, for I just ain't going to care. If you would only smile and look happy like you used to it would please me more than if old Santa would give me everything in his pack."

The mother drew the little one to her bosom and kissed her fondly, and she felt a pang of pain in her troubled heart when she heard a sigh which Midget had tried in vain to suppress. A desperate resolution possessed her and she released the little one and said:

"Midget, dear, you will hang up your little stockings tonight as you have always done, and good Santa Claus may find you when he visits the miners' children in this dreary town. I somehow feel that he will not pass you by, but if he should do so, you must not grieve too greatly. Mamma is going out for a while and you must stay close by the stove and try to keep warm. I will go to the post-office and I may hear from the Denver manager to whom I wrote for an engagement. Good-bye, baby, and try to think that Santa Claus may find you even if you are a stranger in this desolate place."

If the thin muslin wall which separated her room from the adjoining one had vanished Mrs. Raymond would have seen sitting near it a big roughly clad mine boss, with traces of tears in his honest eyes. She was not aware as she left the hotel that he followed her, wading through the deep snow in the street.

He saw her enter the post-office and come forth again with a look of disappointment and distress on her face. She raised her eyes to look about her, and he observed that they were filled with tears. When she observed three gilded balls hanging in front of a shack across the street she started to cross over, then halted as if irresolute. For several moments she stood there, her eyes fixed upon the ground, then, with compressed lips she crossed over and entered the pawnbroker's shop. "Big John" read the story at a glance. Some cherished keepsake was going in order that her little daughter should have a visit from the children's saint. When she came forth the miner was standing in front of the shop, and she asked:

"Can you tell me, sir, if there is a shop or store in this town where Christmas presents are kept; such as children like on Christmas, you know?"

He was about to tell her that he had overheard her conversation with her little girl and that she must go right back to the house out of the cold and have no fear, that Santa Claus didn't know his business, but he feared that a tender of assistance and a confession that he had been eavesdropping might offend her, and he bluntly answered:

"Sure thing, ma'am. That store where you see the awnin' packs all such things."

She thanked him and hurried away, and the miner entered the pawnshop.

"What did that woman hang up here, Sol?" he asked.

"A heavy gold ring, Shon, worth not less than ten dollars. That woman vas a lady, Shon, and I vas sorry to took the pledge from her, for she kissed it and shed some tears when she handed it to me. I bet you a hundred dollar it vas her vedding ring and she don'd got some husband any more."

"How much did you let her have on it?"

"Two dollar. I offered her five, but she vouldn't took it. She said she might not be able to raise enough to redeem it."

"Now, look here, Sol, you know me and you know I wouldn't do anything crooked," John said. "I'll pay the loan and interest on the ring right now, and promise you that the woman will wear it in its place on her finger when she goes to breakfast tomorrow morning."

"O, my cracious, Shon, I couldn't do that. De ring's a pledge, you know, and I vouldn't dare gif it to anybody but de owner. Do you know de lady, Shon?"

The miner reflected for a moment, and then told the pawnbroker what he had heard through the canvas partition at the hotel. His strong voice trembled with emotion as he repeated the little one's words and told of the mother's grief and of her resolution that her darling girl should not be deprived of her Christmas pleasures. He then detailed his plan of calling upon the miners, gamblers and other residents of the town asking all who would to play a hand in the Santa Claus game over which he would preside.

"Santa Claus is close on the trail of those people, Sol, and he is goin' to run onto their camp in great shape, and when she wakes up in the morning the woman's ring ought to be among the stuff she finds in her stockin's."

"Holy Moses, Shon, that vas a gray horse with some more colors. That vas different, an' you bet your life de ring will be dere an you don t pay me von cent, too. Und see here, Shon; here's a bootiful little lady's gold vatch und chain dat I brought here from Denver mit my first stock und it's so small dat nobody von't buy it in dis camp, und dat goes mit de ring for de little girl's Chris'-mas, too. Und say, Shon, ven you seel all de boys und you don'd git all you vant, yust bring me a snowball und I'll advance you ten dollar on it und lay it out in de sun."

With the ring in his pocket John started on a tour of the saloons and gambling houses of the camp. Quietly he told the story to the listening groups. A woman in distress. That was enough to open the hearts and the purses of the generous westerners congregated in the various places, and the canvas bag grew more and more corpulent as he went the round. Gold, silver and paper money came into the fund from willing hands, and when the tour was completed the bag seemed almost bursting with its load of treasure. Returning to the hotel with a few companions, the miner held a consultation with the landlord which concluded by the latter saying:

"Yes, take a knife an' slit the thing open. I can have it sewed up again."

During the early hours of the night men moved softly about the hotel office whispering mysteriously, or sat near the stove conversing in low tones. The landlord's wife had gone to Mrs. Maynard's room, ostensibly for a womanly chat, but really on a mission at Big John's request, and when, an hour later, she silently glided into the office a score of men surrounded her.

"She is just going to bed," the woman said. "The poor creature is all in from weariness and worry, and I induced her to take a dose of laudanum before retiring. The little girl is sleeping soundly and I assisted the mother in placing the few cheap toys she purchased in the little stockings hanging on the back of a chair at the foot of the bed. The woman took hers off as I was leaving and they are lying on her shoes beside the bed. The laudanum will cause her to sleep soundly, but be careful and not make any unnecessary noise."

Shortly after midnight, had Mrs. Maynard been awake, some very mysterious actions would have met her eyes, and, perhaps, might have caused her to scream for help, but her opiate-induced sleep was very heavy. In the moonlight which flooded her room through the window, she might have seen Big John's honest face appear at the opening in the wall, his head cautiously come through it and his keen eyes peer around the room. She might have seen his burly form follow his head through the slit in the canvas, move cautiously to a chair and remove the little stockings. She might have seen the great form stoop at the bedside and have heard searching hands moving over the bare floor; have seen the form arise, stand at the bedside and peer lovingly at the face of the little sleeper by her side, then move noiselessly away and disappeart through the slit canvas, carrying in one hand the wee stockings and in the other a silken pair of much larger size. But she quietly slept on unconscious of the fact that her room had been invaded by a warm-hearted representative of Santa Claus.

The gray winter daylight was feeling its way over the western slope when Mrs. Maynard was awakened by her little girl shaking her and saying:

"Mamma, wake up. I want to tell you something. I had the funniest dream. I dreamed I saw Santa Claus in the room, but he didn't look a bit like old Santa. He was a great big man with a big moustache, and he stood at the bed looking at me so pitiful, and there were tears in his eyes. I could see him real good in the moonlight, and he had such a kind face. Then he sighed and walked over and disappeared right through the wall, just as if there had been no wall there. Wasn't that a funny dream? I didn't seem to be asleep at all, it all seemed so sure enough."

The mother smiled at the queer recital and said:

"If it really was Santa, darling, he may have been hunting you and may have left you something. Jump up and look at your stockings."

The little one needed no second bidding. Rising from the bed she went to the chair upon which she had hung the receptacles for Santa's gifts, if he should happen to come.

"Oh! mamma!"

"Well, what did you get, baby?"

"A gold watch, mamma! A really, truly, weeny, teenty gold watch!"

"A what, Midget? Why, child, is your brain turned by your dream? Santa Claus never brings gold watches to poor children."

"O, he did, mamma, he did, he did, he did, and it's a real watch, and it is ticking. Just look!"

She placed the watch in her mother's hand, and the woman rose up in bed, her face a picture of unfeigned amazement.

"And there's something in your stocking, too, mamma!"

"In my stocking? Bring it here."

"O, it's so heavy I can hardly lift it. I just believe I did see Santa, and it wasn't a dream at all."

The mother reached for the stocking and when she felt its weight and it flashed upon her that it was freighted with money she almost collapsed with astonishment. She poured the treasure out on the bed; gold and silver coin and paper money, wealth she never dreamed she would possess, and in the shining heap laid her wedding ring.

Scarcely knowing whether she was awake or dreaming the woman hastily dressed and, taking the little girl by the hand went to the hotel office to endeavor to unravel the mystery by questioning the landlord. The moment they entered Midget cried out excitedly:

"There he is mamma! There is the Santa I saw in my dreams! That large gentleman with the big moustache."

The big fellow attempted to escape into the street, but the landlord caught him and dragged him back.

"O, sir, is it to you we are indebted for this great good fortune?" said Mrs. Maynard, extending her hand.

He took the hand gingerly, blushing like a schoolgirl, and blurted out:

"Please don't mention it, ma'am. You see it was just like this. Me an' the boys accidentally found out you was in trouble, you an' that little angel girl, and—and—and—well, we just bunched up and pulled you out—you know, as good Christians ought to do, and 'taint nothing worth wastin' speech on, so don't mention it, please."

"An' yit again, it's jes' like this, ma'am," the landlord said. "This 'yar John is a big bashful cuss when thar's a woman in the deal, an' he made us all sw'ar we would keep our talk boxes shet an' wouldn't never let you know where the stuff come from. It's all right, ma'am, an' on the dead squar', an' you kin pack up an' go to your friends as soon as you want to, an' in a year you'll forgit you ever bumped up against sich trouble as you struck in this camp. Yer trunk's here in the house at yer service, an' no charge tag on it. We're all only too happy to wish you a Merry Chris'mas, ma'am, and a big string more of 'em in futur'. I might add that there's nothin' on the book again you at this hotel."

With tears of joy in her eyes she turned to again thank John for his noble work, but the big fellow had escaped and had gone down the street to tell his fellows of the result of their generosity. Later in the day he again met the widow in the hotel and mastered his modesty sufficiently to hold a quite long conversation with her. When the stage drove up the next morning to take her and her little girl to the railroad it was observed that John busied himself in getting her and her trunk on board, and at the good-bye held her hand longer than was really necessary for such a ceremony, and he waved his hat enthusiastically as the drivers whip cracked and the vehicle rolled away.

A few months later at their home in Denver, where the widow had settled, Midget said to a little playfellow:

"I'm going to have a new papa next week when he comes down from the mines."

"Who is he?"

"Big John Santa Claus. I don't know his other name yet."

NEW M. P. THEATRE AT SOUTHINGTON, CONN.

Mr. D. O. Coleman expects to open a new 600-seat house devoted exclusively to pictures, at Southington, Conn., on Saturday, December 28. He has purchased through Mr. J. H. Hallberg, "The Economizer Man," a Powers No. 6-A with Hallberg Standard A. C. Economizer, a two-machine asbestos booth, and full line of supplies. Mr. Hallberg also shipped a Powers No. 6-A to B. E. Wilson, New Hartford, N. Y., and a Motiograph to H. Mulkey, Clarendon, Tex.

CHICAGO

The Washington Theatre, at 22 North Fortieth avenue, is a neat playhouse and is doing its share of business, considering the downtown rush of holiday shoppers.

* * * *

The old theatrical landmark, twenty-one years ago known as the Havlin Theatre, on Wabash avenue near Nineteenth street, was sold last Thursday by the former owners, the Messrs. Max and David Weber, to Solomon Rubin, for the cash sum of $100,000. The lot is 75 x 172 feet, and contains a six-story hotel, in the front of which is the theatre entrance, the auditorium being in the rear of the building. I understand the theatre is to be opened as a vaudeville and picture showhouse.

* * * *

Last week what was considered one of Chicago's best, strongest and safest fireproof moving picture theatres, The Home, at 1539 Milwaukee avenue, made almost entirely of steel and concrete, collapsed, allowing the heavy cement roof and steel girders to crash to the floor, mashing everything on the floor as flat as paper. This happened in the forenoon, and all Chicago is heartily thankful that it happened at the time it did, for hearts stand still and the citizens in that neighborhood gasp when their thoughts revert to what would have been the awful consequences and loss of life had the accident occurred during a performance in the house. Not one soul could have escaped from beneath that terrible weight. The house had a seating capacity of over six hundred, and was popular in the neighborhood. The cause is being rigidly investigated, and when the responsibility is established, the guilty one or ones are sure to suffer, and, I hope, to the fullest extent of the law.

Out on the beautiful Garfield Boulevard, in one of Chicago's fashionable residence districts, is the ever-popular President Theatre, which never in its history enjoyed such prosperity as at present. Nightly this magnificent playhouse is thronged, and hundreds stand patiently outside waiting for "the next show" to begin, seemingly contented, knowing that they will get their full money's worth when they are finally seated within. This house is one of the few which gives its patrons first-run pictures every night, together with first-class vaudeville performances. The orchestral harmony and volume alone is worth more than the price of admission.

On New Year's Eve this house gives three performances: at 7:30, 9:30 and 11:30, the last lapping over into the new year. Several stars from the vaudeville field, and moving picture films fresh from the cameras of our best picture makers, will go to make up the splendid program of this one grand evening.

A neat, tasty souvenir note has just been printed, agreeably describing the different acts and reels, which will shortly be mailed to the thousands of best-known patrons of the house, for this special one night of real enjoyment; and to show the progressiveness of the management and to give all a chance ticket reservations are even now ready, and many are availing themselves of the opportunity to be sure of entrance upon this all-important, memorable occasion.

I stepped into the private office of Manager T. J. Carmody, of the Academy of Music, Halsted near Madison street, for a little chat late Thanksgiving afternoon, and incidentally asked him how business had been for the half day. He smilingly answered: "Five thousand persons have passed into our showhouse so far this afternoon."

* * * *

If hustling and up-to-date business methods mean anything, then M. D. Christopher, the new manager of the pretty little five-cent theatre at 112 South Halsted street, is sure to prove a winner. Good luck to you, Mr. Christopher.

The proprietors of the Forum Theatre, 369 Garfield Boulevard, the Gelder Brothers, have in course of erection at Sixty-third street and Vernon avenue, a thoroughly fireproof showhouse, to seat 400, which will open the first of the new year.

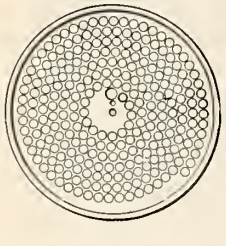
INNOVATIVE

Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Especially for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City

IN the United States Patent Office the registration of a trade-mark is an official confirmation of the registrant's prior and exclusive right to use the same for a certain class of goods as against all others. It is prima facie evidence, and the registrant needs no other to establish the date of his first use of the mark. Furthermore, it puts litigation relating thereto within the jurisdiction of the Federal courts, so that an injunction secured in one Federal court will be enforced in all such courts in any state; and an injunction and triple damages may be obtained in case of infringement. Registration also puts the burden of proof on the user of the unregistered trade-mark in case of litigation; and there are other practical advantages of registration in the patent office.

But owners of trade-marks should understand that the trade-mark laws in other countries, notably Germany, Austria-Hungary, Argentine Republic, Bolivia, Brazil, Chili, China, Paraguay, Peru, Venezuela, Uruguay, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Denmark, Finland, Norway, Sweden, Spain, Japan and Cuba, are fundamentally different from those of the United States in that the first registrant acquires property therein, even to the exclusion of the rightful owner. Hence American exporters ought to realize the importance of registering their marks in all foreign countries to which they send their goods, and this applies with full force to the trade connected with the motion picture art.

litigation is presumably free from discord, but Drum versus Drum (133 Mass. 566) and Horn versus Bray (51 Ind. 555) indicate dissonance of sounds in either case, and that "dire was the noise of conflict."

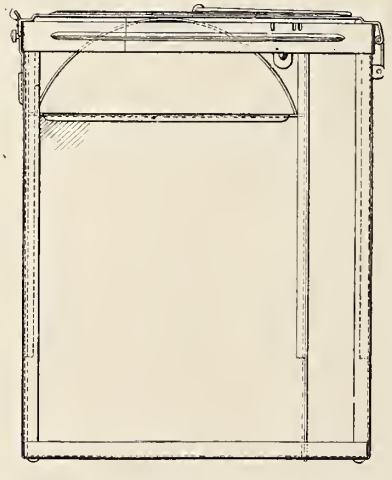


Patent No. 1,045,502, to George W. Bingham, of Brooklyn, N. Y., assignor to Bingham Cameron Company, a corporation of New York, relates to films for moving picture machines, and is designed to supersede the strip film with all its disadvantages, such as the wear and tear of wind and rewind, unwieldliness, unnecessary bulk and numerous other objections, among others the necessity of printing the pictures individually and successively one after another. The specification states that the invention consists "broadly" in placing the pictures upon the film in a series of rows side by side, but the claims are restricted to the use in combination therewith of an opening preceding the pictures of a size as large as, or larger than, the pictures so as to permit the free passage of the beam of light from the projector before the film is set in motion, thus preventing overheating, etc. The application for this patent was filed as long ago as October 25, 1909, and it refers to Patent No. 971,588, granted October 4, 1910, as showing mechanism suitable for driving the disc with the spirally arranged pictures shown in the accompanying cut. As before intimated, the specification is drawn on broad lines, but the two claims are each limited to the formation of the disc with the safety ray-opening referred to.

light of recent and prospective scientific advancement even the blind may hope for startling innovations. Dr. Dussaud, of Paris, has produced a motion picture apparatus for the blind, whereby they may experience the illusion of moving objects as people with sight do in viewing an illuminated film screen. The apparatus consists of a machine operated by electricity which causes a series of reliefs, representing trees, birds, or other objects, to pass rapidly under the fingers. The reliefs are so graduated that the delicate sense of touch possessed by the blind translates their variations into apparent movements of the objects which are represented. The device is employed mainly for educational purposes.

But the blind are not the only ones who cannot see. As the human ear has its limitations at both ends of the scale so that extremely slow or extremely rapid vibrations are inaudible, so, unaided, the human eye is incapable of detecting very slow movement, as the growth of a plant, or very rapid movement, as the passage of a rifle ball. For this reason the Cinematograph has been utilized by Professor Cranz of the Charlottenberg Military Academy in the investigation of ballistic phenomena, the flight of insects, and so forth, where the speed limit of the eye is exceeded. However, instead of the usual sixteen or thirty-two exposures per second, he makes many thousands in that comparatively short space of time, having attained even as high as 100,000 to the second. The exposures are effected on a film moving continuously at a very high rate of speed, by means of a succession of electric sparks, the flashes being so short in duration as to practically nullify the displacement of film during these intervals, lasting perhaps the one hundredth-thousandth part of a second. Thus owing to the enormous rate at which the sparks follow each other and to their remarkable luminous intensity, several thousand pictures per second may readily be produced. Obviously by passing these pictures slowly through a projector the images may be brought within the scope of human vision, just as, inversely the growth of a plant may be rendered obvious by speeding the film. Thus the invisible is rendered visible, and may be studied minutely and at leisure. Unlimited scientific and educational potentials are involved in this innovation in the art.

"The right of every man to be his own lawyer is not to be abridged," per MacLean, J. in Anderson v. Stemson, 84 N. Y. Supp. 1117. This prerogative, however, does not necessarily eliminate the danger of his having a fool for a client, nor from rushing in where (Satanic) angels fear to tread.



Patent No. 1,045,663 to Frederick W. Barnes of Rochester, N. Y., assignor to the Eastman Kodak Co. Corporation, relates particularly to the development and general chemical treatment of photographic plate negatives and it has for one of its objects the provision of a suitable rack or container for holding a single plate or a plurality of plates during treatment, which rack will be simple and convenient in operation and capable of production at a relatively low cost. The improvements are further directed toward providing a device of the nature outlined having features adapting it for use with plates of a number of different sizes, the latter being in each instance held securely to prevent damage, either by contact with each other or otherwise while offering ready means of access for the fluid bath. The accompanying view represents a side elevation of the rack. The claims are for the combination with a frame or holder having interiorly arranged guides and an open side through which the plates are adapted to be inserted edgewise within said guides, of a closure for the open side of the holder and a yielding or resilient filler member formed to fit within the closure above the plates and between the guides and to be confined between the edges of the latter and the closure, together with other specific features of construction.

Friedrich Deckel, G.M.B.H., Munich, Germany, applies for registration of the trade-mark "Compur" for Photographic Cameras, Projecting Apparatus, Cinematographs, etc. Claims used since November 6, 1911.

Registration (No. 89,456) of "ETRAL" has been granted L. Gevaert & Co., Vieux-Dieu, near Antwerp, Belgium, as a trade-mark for photographic supplies. Used since November, 1911.

Registration No 89,511 is granted the Societa Anonima Milano Films, Bolivia, near Milan, Italy, for the annexed trade-mark for Cinematograph Films, used since "about 1912."

Commissioner Moore in a recent decision (O. G. 185, p. 827) holds that the mere size of a trade-mark does not make it non-registerable; nor does the fact that it is applied to the goods by being made integral therewith in the process of manufacture.

President—Robert Goldblatt.
Vice-President—James Daisie.
Recording Secretary—George Epstein.
Financial Secretary—Robert Levy.
Sergeant-at-Arms—Ed. Spinola.
Business Representative—Ralph Knaster.

Telephone—Stuyvesant 572.
Office—133 Third Avenue.

With the old year's demise, there passes out of existence the many trials and tribulations that the Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union, No. 1, of New York, had encountered, and with the ushering in of the gladsome "New Year," brings with it a resolution of renewed vigor on the part of this young, but great body of men, to combat by all just means those elements whose purpose in the past were to obstruct by trickery or unfair means to stifle the "Spirit of 76," that is so deeply imbued in the hearts of the members who had the courage and the manliness to declare themselves when justice was denied them. Not alone have they declared themselves so-called "rebels" against a system of discrimination such as they were subjected to, when they were an auxiliary to Local No. 35, I. A. T. S. E., but are firmly resolved that with the coming year they will uphold with a staunch spirit the attitude they have taken with a steadfastness that will not be found wanting, for, should an occasion arise for a "showdown," it shall not be said of them that they turned traitors under fire. Therefore, the resolution of the M. P. M. Operators' Union, No. 1, can be summed up in the words of Daniel Webster, "Sink or swim, survive or perish, we give our hearts and hands to this cause."

Through the medium of this valued pape rthe M. P. M. O. U., No. 1, extends to everyone, be he friend or otherwise, hearty greetings and sincere wishes for a most happy and prosperous New Year, and that the clarion call sounded by this organization for independence from the spotlight workers shall meet with ready response, also hearty approval of every operator who is courageous enough to think for himself, and that before another year dawns upon the universe, the man at the moving picture machine will come to his own ability both as a man and a craftsman of some importance.

We are awaiting the coming event, or big night, when the operators will hold their annual entertainment and ball at Palm Garden, February 10, 1913. The arrangements committee reports that this affair will be the grandest success in the history of the moving picture industry.

The committee has been successful in securing Miss Pearl White and Mr. John Bunny, the two well-known moving picture artists, to lead the grand march; we also have the assurance of other well-known artists to honor us with their presence at this glorious affair. Palm Garden will be elaborately decorated and many people of prominence will be guests and trip the light fantastic to the melodious tunes of Lemleins, N. Y., Hippodrome Band. Tickets for this grand event can be secured at the office of the M. P. M. O. U., No. 1, at 133 Third avenue, New York City.

The next meeting of the M. P. M. O. U., No. 1, will be held on January 6, 1913, at 12 o'clock, midnight, at Teutonia Hall, 66 Essex street, New York.

RALPH KNASTER
Business Representative M. P. M. O. Union No. 1, New York.

Wishing all the Moving Picture Machine Operators a Happy and Prosperous New Year.

RALPH KASTER.

The famous Selig child actress "Baby" Lillian Wade, and Sir Thomas Lipton, the world-famous yachtsman, joined forces November 27th, and did a "turn" together which was duly recorded on a Selig film.

Sir Thomas is an enthusiastic admirer of moving pictures, and proved his devotion to this art by consenting to play a role in a Selig motion picture play in which Baby Lillian Wade appears. A toy yacht figures in the story, and Sir Thomas is seen teaching the children to sail it. The rugged, stalwart Irish baronet is 6 feet 3 inches in his stocking feet.

FOR HER (Dec. 31).—John Hart, a counterfeiter, is arrested in a restaurant while dining with his fifteen-year-old daughter, Mary. He succeeds in concealing the fact from her by excusing himself for a moment and leaves a note and money for her wants, to be delivered to her by Jimmy, the old waiter who has served them a long time.

Some years later when Hart is released from the Federal prison, his first thought is of Mary, whom he seeks in the last place he saw her, the restaurant where Jimmy works. Fate favors him as Mary is there with her husband, one Jack Hanley, who has defied his father's will by marrying Mary, who had become the elder Hanley's stenographer. Hart does not disclose his identity, knowing the disgrace it would cast on his daughter.

Things had gone poorly with Mary and Jack and they were reduced to sore straits—but Jimmy was their friend and often made their simple orders more sumptuous by strategy.

Old Hart at once returned to his counterfeiting—and therefore Stoll, the secret service man, was sent to find him as before. Meanwhile old Hanley had relented having been so harsh and had a private detective looking for his son and daughter-in-law.

Hart, in disguise, frequented the restaurant where Jack and Mary took their meals and tried to find a way of relieving their financial distress, but without success.

Stoll, knowing Hart's love for his daughter and remembering their former place of dining, sought the old counterfeiter there. The detective failed to penetrate Hart's disguise but Jimmy, the old waiter, had not, and gave Hart warning to go. The latter, in trying to bluff the detective, stopped to light a cigar and in doing so used the peculiar mannerisms of the engraver, unconsciously rubbing the steel shavings from between his fingers. The moment he had gone Stoll remembered the mannerism and followed, but Hart escaped through a ruse.

Old Hanley, having located Jack and Mary, gives them a splendid dinner and, incidentally, a fifty dollar tip to old Jimmy, of whose kindness Jack and Mary had told him.

The closing scenes mark the end of Hart's misspent life and are full of tragic pathos.

VITAGRAPH

A WOMAN (Dec. 31).—Self-opinionated, conceited and possessed of a sang froid that takes with most women, Robert Hamilton makes a deep impression with Ida Middleton. She considers him attractive and imagines she loves him. When he knows he has produced this effect he treats her with his usual indifference and flirts with others to test her. She becomes piqued at his treatment and marries Frank Martin for spite. Frank is a fellow of sterling worth and honesty. On the day of their marriage, after they are wedded, he takes her in his arms to kiss her and she repulses him and tells him that she does not love him and his kisses are distasteful to her. For the moment he is shocked, but accepts the situation and thereafter treats her with cold politeness. They live in this way for months, during which Ida grows to love him and to appreciate the difference between him and a man of Hamilton's stripe. She tries to undo that which she has done by little attentions to win the affection which she so slightly regarded in the beginning.

One evening, at a reception, she meets Robert Hamilton. When she is alone for a moment in the conservatory, he enters intoxicated and forces his attention upon her, folding her in his arms and kissing her. She struggles to free herself from his embrace and at this moment her husband enters the room. Completely upset by this incident she asks her husband to take her home. He escorts her to his taxi and after she has entered, he closes the door and bids her good night. Downcast and unhappy, she returns to her home and struggles with her thoughts.

Frank returns home and, reclining on a couch in the library, meditates. Ida enters and sits beside him, explaining to him that she has learned to value his love and longs to enjoy it and give him hers. He smiles his forgiveness and she madly throwing her arms around his neck and he entwining his about her, they give vent to their repressed love for each other in a lingering soulful kiss of ecstatic bliss.

AMY'S CHOICE (Dec. 17).—Amy Martin has two suitors, Edward and George. Both are very attentive and each strives his utmost to outdo his rival in the contest for her favor.

One day Edward calls at Amy's house and, finding her alone, decides to make the best of his opportunity. After playing tennis together and wandering through the beautiful grounds. Edward, feeling sure that he is the favored lover, takes Amy in his arms. She becomes very indignant at this and, when George arrives upon the scene, gladly goes off with him.

Later, when out with a jolly crowd of young people, she decides to put her suitors to the test. Purposely dropping her handkerchief over a steep cliff, she pretends to be terribly distressed over the loss. Edward hesitates, but George bravely makes the perilous descent and, soon afterward, amid the cheers of the onlookers, restores her property, thus proving his courage.

She now begins to realize that she prefers George, and the next day, when Edward comes to call, she places a bundle of books under his arm, saying it is time for him to return to college.

URBAN-ECLIPSE—GEORGE KLEINE

A FOUR-FOOTED CUPID (Jan. 1).—Spot's master, Jack Fowler, and pretty Alice Bliss are sweethearts. They are very fond of each other and also of Spot. But, alas, one day they have a falling out! Alice flings her engagement ring at Jack and walks away, determined never to forgive him.

The two lovers spend a very lonely afternoon and at length each decides to write the other an apology, making an appointment for the next day, but then, suddenly remembering their former wrath, they change their minds.

Fortunately, Spot has an inspiration: he sees the letter sticking out of his master's pocket and, taking it in his mouth, runs to mail it. He then goes to see Alice, who has left her letter on the table and, absorbed in her sorrow, does not notice Spot as he enters the room, jumps upon the table, and, taking the letter, carries it off to the post box also.

The next day Jack and Alice receive the apologies and eagerly make their way to the appointed rendezvous. With a little further assistance from Spot, they kiss and make up, vowing on Spot's head never to quarrel again.

On the same reel:

LAUGHING BILLY.—Billy meets a pal, who tells him a funny story. Billy cannot stop laughing at the joke and insists upon sharing it with everyone, including business men, washerwomen, howling babies and even a diver at his work. Although unappreciated, the fellow keeps repeating the tale until, returning home, he meets his wife, who, resenting his foolish mirth, belabors him over the head with a broom, but Billy still laughs on.

AMERICAN

LONELINESS OF NEGLECT (Dec. 30).—Ralph Higgins and his wife had been married but a short time when the young husband, ambitious to better himself, moved with his bride to a deserted grant of land in the lonely hills. There was no human person near them save an aged hermit, of whom they quickly made a friend, giving him a much-needed blanket.

But crops failed and the love begun so blightly faded in the everlasting glare of hopeless sunshine and, at the hopeless word of the hermit that no crops could prosper in that alkali deadened soil, the husband left to find a new home alone. He promised to send for her.

A home he found and a land of promise. Crops grew and his stock multiplied, but ever he postponed sending for that lonesome wife back in the hills. Loneliness enveloped her and neglect ate deeply into her soul. One day a stranger came. He was nice to her and she begged him to remain. Temptation whispered and she came near answering.

And then, warned by the hermit, the husband came, proud and happy in his victory and joyous in thought of her innocent surprise when she could hear it. He came—just at the right time to save her and his own happiness.

LUBIN

THE BRAVERY OF DORA (Dec. 31).—Dora Miller and her father, together with Juan, a young half-breed, live peacefully at their ranch along the Rio Grande. Juan is in love with Dora and she is not averse to him. The old father smiles on the young couple. One morning while the little family is seated at breakfast, shots are heard outside. A party of U. S. soldiers have been attacked by Mexican troops and, retreating as they fight, finally take refuge in the Miller homestead. The doors and windows are barricaded and a sharp fight ensues. Juan, the half-breed, refuses at first to fire against the people whose blood runs in his veins, but at last, infuriated by the sight of a wound received by Dora, he grabs the rifle and begins firing furiously. He is thus engaged as the Mexican troops break into the house and is captured by them and locked in an upstairs room. The commanding officer of the Mexican forces promises to shoot Juan the next morning. That night, however, Dora manages to get into the room where Juan is confined and smuggles to him a rope with which he escapes. The next morning the Mexican officer sends for Juan to carry out his threat of shooting him and, much to the surprise of the guard when the room is opened, out steps Dora. Furious at the escape of his victim, the Mexican promptly arrests Dora's father and tells her that should her half-breed lover not return by afternoon the father will take his place in front of a firing squad. In the meantime Juan is hastening at breakneck speed on a horse taken from the Mexicans, to secure aid. Arriving at the camp of an American patrol he gets the sergeant in charge to accompany him and, with the entire troup of cavalry, rushes back to the Miller homestead, arriving just in time to prevent the execution of the old man by the vengeful Mexicans.

LOVE AND THE LAW (Jan. 2).—John Allen is in love with pretty Mabel Trude and the honor conferred upon Allen by the community electing him sheriff aids him in pressing his suit. The engagement is announced and Allen is the happiest man in seven states.

Tom Trude, the brother of Mabel, is a sort of shiftless fellow and is exceedingly unlucky at cards. It requires but little argument on the part of the acknowledged best man of the community to win Tom over to his gang, as he hopes to make good his losses at cards in some manner other than actual labor. The post-office is held up and the sheriff called upon to bring the perpetrators to justice. A lively encounter is followed by the escape and pursuit of one of the men. The sheriff himself took up the chase and successfully runs down the man. To his consternation it proves to be Mabel's brother. He passes their home with the prisoner in tow. Mabel argues and pleads but to no avail, and she finally plays her largest card—her love against her brother's liberty.

The mental struggle of the sheriff is intense but he wins and, as he pockets the engagement ring returned by Mabel, he marches his prisoner off to jail.

JOHN ARTHUR'S TRUST (Jan. 2).—John Arthur, lawyer, awkward and shy, has in his care the immense fortune left by Charles Bristol for his daughter Lottie. So great was old Bristol's confidence in the young lawyer that he made it a condition of his will that John could use his own discretion in finally turning the money over to his daughter. The income she is to receive but the principal is to remain under the watchful eye of John Arthur until Lottie is married to a man who.

in John's estimation, would be capable of managing the fortune. John has seen the girl on several occasions relative to business and her beauty appealed to him, although thoughts of love never enter his mind. All that he looks forward to is business. But when a foreigner, Count Borni, comes and courts Lottie, John becomes conscious of feelings he doesn't understand. He dislikes the Count even before he sees him. Just as a matter of business, however, he writes to a London firm inquiring about the Count's reputation. He learns that the Count is a profligate and a bankrupt. John finds that Lottie has already lost her romantic young heart to the Count, and all his warnings are in vain. The Count, of course, expects Lottie's millions will be turned over to him upon their marriage, but John refuses to relinquish his control of the money. Lottie's governess is crafty. She proposes to the Count that she will get the money from John providing he (the Count) will pay her $10,000 after his marriage to Lottie. The Count accepts the proposition and signs an agreement. The governess poisons Lottie's mind against John and Lottie accuses him of wishing to control her fortune for his own personal reasons. Angered, John relinquishes the fortune to Lottie. The Count's plans are somewhat disordered by a sudden notion on Lottie's part to be married abroad. John learns of a passage to Europe suddenly booked by Lottie and the Count. He realizes that he loves the girl. He does not hope to win her, but determines to prevent the Count taking advantage of her innocence. The news comes an hour before sailing time. Too late to arrange for first-class passage but driven by grim purpose, he buys a steerage ticket. He meets the Count, Lottie and governess while they are on a tour of the ship, but is restrained by the ship's officers. Arriving at their destination he follows the Count one night to a gambling house in hopes of finding an opportunity to expose him. The Count loses money supplied by the governess, but boasts to his friends about his conquest of an heiress. He holds Lottie's picture up to the gaze of the gamblers. He does not see John until John snatches the picture from him and knocks him down. A duel is fought in which John is wounded. The next day Lottie overhears an argument between the Count and the governess which opens her eyes. She finds John in a hospital. On his recovery Lottie makes him her guardian for life.

PUNCH

A NEAR TRAGEDY (Jan. 2).—The trouble starts when the parents of little Herbert Rice leave him and his tiny sister in full possession of the house while they go to a matinee. Sis wants to play "lady" but her mother's new evening gown is so long that it is necessary to cut a few feet of the skirt off to make it fit. Rice finds that his father's silk hat and grandmother's glasses make him look like a first-class doctor so it is necessary for Sis to be taken desperately ill so that little Doctor Rice can perform an operation. It takes a large bottle of red ink to furnish the requisite amount of blood, and when the children hear their parents returning the bedroom looks like a slaughter house. Fearing a whipping, Herbert and Sis hide behind the portieres and their unhappy parents think that they have been murdered. A famous detective, backed by the police department, finds some wonderful clues and is making a name for himself when the kids appear and solve the most horrible crime since Abel was bumped off by his strenuous brother Cain.

On the same reel:

HER MISCHIEVOUS BROTHER.—Count "No Account" borrows enough money to come to the land of beautiful heiresses and meets the "Queen of the Human Race," who is struggling along on a few paltry million a year. The Queen falls for the Count's accent and her poor boob sweetheart finds himself relegated to the side lines with the rest of the substitutes. But the Queen has a kid brother who is a throw-back to the ancestor who collected the change. The kid knows a "bunk" count by instinct and sides with the boob. He helps him secrete himself in a suit of armor where he can watch the Count and the Queen say sweet nothings to each other, and incidentally make things unpleasant for his foreign rival. With the kid's active aid —made more active by the promise of a ten dollar bill—the no-account Count counts for very little, especially in the police station, where the last act but one is enacted. The last act being little Herbert Rice trying to put ten pounds of candy into a two-pound capacity stomach.

MAJESTIC

LOVE AND THE TELEPHONE (Dec. 29).—Anna Wilson, the pretty telephone girl working in the office of Jennings & Co., brokers, is loved by Hugh Jennings, who tries to force his attentions upon her. When he discovers that she is engaged to John Mason, a young clerk, he is furious. He pretends friendship for the young man and leads him on to speak of his own affairs. He learns that John is anxious to make money in stocks and is only waiting (to buy) for a tip to take his savings and invest them. He tells John to buy United Copper and the boy believes him. He is letting him in on a good thing. But Jennings wants to see John lose all he has, hoping that in that event Anna will turn to him. John tells Anna about United Copper. She is doubtful at first but he soon wins her over. He starts off for the bank to draw his money, anxious to get it out as soon as possible. While he is gone Anna, at the 'phone, comes in on a busy wire and overhears a conversation between Jennings and another broker in which Jennings says that United Copper is going to take a big drop. Then she sees the trap. When John comes in she warns him—but he refuses to believe, and so anxious is he to throw his money away that in desperation the girl locks him in the inner office. For the rest of the afternoon he is a prisoner, while the girl waits at the ticker, scanning the tape for United Copper. It goes up at first—but then just as surely it drops, point by point. Three o'clock arrives, the market closes with United Copper wiped out. Then Anna releases John. He rushes to the ticker to read the truth. As he is thanking the girl Jennings enters, to be told that the money is safe and his mean plan known to both the girl and her fiance.

JIM'S COLLEGE DAYS (Dec. 31).—Jim Hadley, a poor but ambitious young man, is working his way through college by tutoring his roommate, a good-natured athletic fellow with a rich, indulgent father and a pretty, coquettish sister, Marion Brown.

Jim tries to get on the football team, but the captain, Ned Hayward, is in love with Marion himself and he will not appoint Jim to a position. Jim is on the squad, however, and works hard at the position of substitute for Sam's position.

Sam gambles, goes to dances, despite the objections of the trainer and the coach, saying, "I am always in good training," etc. Jim gets unpopular by trying to make him work hard, and at last does a good deal of Sam's work in the wee sma' hours to help him pass in his studies. The afternoon before the big game Sam's sister, Marion, comes to the study with some other girls and her mother. They have tea and, sitting in the window seat, Jim proposes. The girl likes him but shakes her head, and her mother, suspecting the conversation, interferes with great pride. That night Sam goes to a fraternity dance, Jim staying at home to write a long essay for him. Jim's head aches and he leaves the dormitory to take a long walk. He sees some students whom he knows for bad ones, meet three fellows with suit cases, who are strangers. They hobnob together gleefully, and Jim sees the three men from his college pay the others enormous sums of money. They go into a barroom to finish the talk, and Jim steps into the rear vestibule to overhear them if possible. He learns that his sneaky college mates are betting against their own college, through the newcomers, and that they are going to drug Sam Brown, the star player of the team, and any others possible. Jim hurries away to the fraternity house where Sam is dancing. He sends in his name for Sam, and Marion happens to walk out on the portico, between dances, with Ned Hayward, the captain. She greets Jim, and Ned sees that she likes the other. He is jealous and tries to get her away. Sam comes out, Ned tells him that Jim is intruding, and the roommates quarrel before Sam will listen to the warning. As they stand there, the three plotters walk quietly into the fraternity house, unnoticed. They are preparing for their work, being members. Jim returns home, to their rooms, and waits all night in vain. Sam does not come back! Next morning, worn out with worry, Jim telephones to his home in the city—no news. He hunts up the coach and the trainer of the team and they start out to find Sam. No results. They jump into an auto and whiz to Sam's father's office. Marion and her mother have come there, in their furs, to go to the big game with him. They rush back to the college grounds, and as they are passing a saloon, big Sam, still in his dress suit, crumpled, dirty and almost unconscious, is pushed out of the door by an angry barkeeper. They stop, learn that he has been drinking all night, and ride for a doctor. No avail! He is out of the game. They get to the training quarters and find the team waiting for them. Sam is able to walk now, and realizes his folly. He sobs, but his teammates, once so fond of him, threaten him bodily violence, including the captain, Ned Hayward. They are frenzied and, while they are holding their pow-wow officials come into the quarters, telling them that the time is up—the game must start. They look around, and the captain ruefully sizes up the substitutes who line up before him. Jim Holliday has donned his football suit and stands there quietly waiting, but very excited. The coach looks at Sam, and then points to Jim. He orders the captain to put Jim in the position—the captain refuses. The coach threatens to call the game, and the captain yields, with bad grace. The players put on their blankets, and without another word run off to the quarters, into the field. The view of the game in progress is shown, then, from an actual football game. After a big sensational play the camera is shown interior again in the quarters. The players run in, with Jim on their shoulders, students crowding around. They start out the little door into the inclosure, back of the quarters, and there they are met by Sam, who throws his arms around the shoulders of his roommate who won the game, while Mr. Brown, his wife, Marion and the girls rush up. They congratulate Jim, and the captain, Ned Haywood, who observes Marion's meaning better than Jim, comes up to congratulate them both. Jim is made a partner of Mr. Brown—and the ending is obvious.

"101" BISON

THE ROMANCE OF THE UTAH PIONEERS (Jan. 7).—Edward Martin and Alice are married as they start out for Salt Lake with the "Hand-cart Immigrants," so-called because a number of the adventurers pushed and pulled their belongings ahead of them on small, rough carts. Edward Martin is made captain of the train.

The Indian tribes are at peace, and little Watana and Mountain Pine make love as Watana weaves her pretty baskets. Unfortunately the Mexican raiders are in the vicinity, capturing Indians and selling them into slavery. Watana is seized and taken away and is made love to by the guide. Mountain Pine traces her and rides back and arouses the Indians, who steal up on the marauders and annihilate them. Watana and other Indians are rescued.

The Indians are flushed with victory and consumed with hatred for all placefaces. They see the Hand-cart Immigrants and determine to attack them.

Edward Martin and his followers have had a hard time. The guide is killed by falling over a cliff and the party is lost. Starvation and thirst stare them in the face and the whole party is suffering intensely.

Little Watana has had her meed of suffering and determines to try and save the immigrants. She pleads with Mountain Pine and the old chief and they listen to her, and instead of attacking the party decide to help them. The immigrants find water, which revives them and sustains them long enough to allow Watana to bring them provisions.

Little Watana is puzzled when Alice kisses her, but she decides that the practice is a good one, and imparts the experience to the astonished Mountain Pine, who also thinks it nice.

REX

BY GONE DAYS (Jan. 12).—A picture play depicting the pathetic end of an old actor.

He is shown in his room thinking of bygone days, when the landlady enters and demands her rent, which is in arrears. The old man has no money, and pleads for a little time. The landlady is obdurate and orders him into the street.

He goes to his old trunk, takes therefrom a scrap book, which he opens, and it brings back to him memories of years gone by when he was the idol of the public.

He sees himself as the Melancholy Dane; the heroic Antony; the dramatic Richelieu; and a brooding Othello. They all pass before him as in a dream, and finally the book drops from his hands, and he dies.

CRYSTAL

HEROIC HAROLD (Jan. 12).—Harold is of a very timid disposition. He is in love with Pearl, whose father does not look with favor upon Harold's suit. Harold calls on Pearl and father sticks around. To rid themselves of the old gent, Pearl plays the piano and Harold sings. Father exits, leaving the young couple to their love making. Father goes into the library to read. Meanwhile a burglar enters the dining room and proceeds to help himself to the family plate. Harold, hearing a noise, goes into the dining room and, after a tussle, the burglar succeeds in making his escape. Pearl tells Harold to pretend that he is fighting the burglar and she will bring father to witness his bravery. This Pearl does and father prepares his revolver for action. Harold meanwhile is making a wreck of the dining room, upsetting table and chairs, and father enters just as the burglar is supposed to have jumped through the window. Harold and Pearl tell of their great feat in vanquishing the intruder and father's objections to Harold are a thing of the past.

An exceedingly amusing farce, with Miss Pearl White as the daughter and Mr. Chester Barnett as Harold. On the same reel:

A NIGHT AT THE CLUB.—Mr. Boredman promises to take his wife to the opera. Instead, his friend Barnett induces him to go out on a lark. Boredman tells his wife that he must go out on business, but, her suspicions being aroused, she follows him. The men go to a gambling house that is masked by being represented as a literary society. They proceed to play when the doorkeeper tells Boredman that his wife is outside. He makes his escape through the window, and she enters, but, being unable to find her husband, gives Barnett a masterful tongue-lashing. Just then the place is raided and everybody in the place is arrested, including Mrs. Boredman. Boredman goes home and, it being very late at night and his wife not being home, he begins to worry. He visits the clubhouse and, getting into an argument with the policeman in charge, is also arrested. Meanwhile Mrs. Boredman is still in jail. Barnett and others are in a cell when, to their surprise, Boredman is brought in to keep them company. Mrs. Boredman shouts her way out of jail in the morning and goes home. Hubby also is released and each pretends that the other has been away all night, claiming to have been at home. However, they explain to each other and fall into each other's arms in sympathy, vowing in the future they would be all to each other.

A unique comedy, full of scenes and situations that are real laugh producers.

NESTOR

CUPID'S ASSISTANTS (Jan. 6).—Eddie and Louise are real nice youngsters, and they, of course, love distractedly. They graduate, and Eddie circles Louise with that little band of gold which means so much.

Louise goes home to her uncle and aunt, who live in the country, and Eddie goes to visit his uncle and aunt, who also live away from town.

The uncles are old friends, but are unaware of the young couple's attachment. The uncles have an old-time agreement whereby the nephew of the one is to marry the niece of the other. The joyful news is broken to the boy and girl, with the result that they write and arrange a meeting in order to escape such a terrible end to love's young dream.

The uncles get wind of the elopement and follow. They all meet and the uncles are surprised when they see each other. They agree to fool the young couple and they are ruthlessly parted.

Eddie is held closely in by his uncle, who tells him the girl he has in mind for him will arrive on a certain day. Eddie is in despair, and when the girl arrives they will not look at each other until forced to do so. When they do see who is before them, they lose no time in coming to a clinch and the uncles are proud of their joke and its happy ending.

ECLAIR

THE COBBLER AND THE FINANCIER (Jan. 12).—It deals with a poor cobbler who sings while he works from morning till night. But his songs disturb his wealthy neighbor, who sends for him and asks, "Can't you hold your tongue when you are working?" The cobbler replies that he cannot, so the financier gives him a sovereign and requests him not to sing any more.

Believing that he is now in possession of all the gold in the world the cobbler departs gleefully, profusely thanking the financier. After a short time, the brave cobbler finds that he is not very happy for he cannot work without singing and cannot live without working. He is in great distress and finally decides to return the money and says, "Take back your sovereign—I must sing so that I can work and be happy." And he returns to his shop, leaving the financier much perplexed.

The next morning the financier is awakened very early by the cobbler's song. But Jeanneton, one of his servants, is sure she has found a way to rid her master of his annoyance. She calls on the cobbler and makes him believe she has fallen in love with him, and he, of course, responds to the advances of the pretty, young girl. She consents to marry him if he should procure a hundred pounds. "So much! How can I get that amount?" Then he remembers his deal with the financier.

He goes to him again and receives the money, promising that he will not sing any more. Of course, the financier asks for a receipt for the money and the happy cobbler, elated with happiness, signs the paper without even reading it.

He hastily returns to his shop. Jeanneton calls and he gives her the hundred pounds, asking her to make good her promise. But instead of getting the girl he is confronted by a horrible sheriff, who has come to turn him out of his shop. Instead of a receipt he has signed a paper reading: "Received from the Count De Montreuil the sum of one hundred pounds in exchange for my cobbler's shop."

HEARTS OF THE NORTHLAND (Jan. 9).—Pierre, a hardy young trapper, loves Marie, a pretty, brainless belle of the woodland, although he is sincerely loved by Gabrielle, the orphaned cousin of Marie.

He and Marie are betrothed. The day of the wedding is near and Pierre is very happy. Henry Brooks, a wealthy New Yorker, arrives in the woods for a hunting trip. He meets Marie and both become fascinated. They elope. Pierre follows them, intent upon punishing Brooks, but arrives at the depot as the train bearing them speeds away.

Marie and Brooks are married and he brings her to his palatial home, where she is very unhappy, as she knows nothing of the conventions of society.

In the meantime Pierre finds consolation in the love of Gabrielle and forgets the butterfly. Marie suffers a nervous breakdown and is advised to take a trip in the North Woods, and leaves accompanied by her husband.

Pierre and Gabrielle soon after their marriage seek a home in a remote spot and find happiness. By a strange turn of the wheel of destiny Brooks and Marie go to the distant village, where they live and are directed for lodgings to the hut of Pierre, who pretends not to recognize Brooks. Later Pierre returns and finds Brooks trying to flirt with Gabrielle, and proceeds to punish him, but Brooks runs away and is pursued until he falls from a cliff. Believing him dead, Pierre climbs down a rope and rouses him from his insensibility. Seeing that he is not seriously injured he tells the shrinking coward he can climb to the summit of the cliff himself and leaves him there, deeming him too petty an object for vengeance.

SOLAX

THE MUTINY OF MR. HENPECK (Jan. 10).—Mr. Mann is a small, insignificant person, and very much afraid of his wife, a woman of considerable avoirdupois, and prepossessing demeanor. While Mr. Mann puts up with his wife's peremptory manners, the servants will not stand for them, and leave her employ. Poor hubby is then forced to take charge of the culinary department, and assume the position of cook and dishwasher, while his wife reads the papers and plays "lady."

Matters come to a climax, however, after the arrival of Mrs. Mann's brother, a prizefighter, who is married to a small, retiring woman, very much afraid of her husband. Mrs. Mann and her brother go to the theatres and sport around town, while Mr. Mann and the prizefighter's little wife stay at home and do the char work.

Mr. Mann and Mrs. Prizefighter get together one evening and decide to give Mrs. Mann and Mr. Prizefighter a big surprise, when they arrive from the theatre.

The last scene shows Mr. Mann looking out of the window telling Mrs. Prizefighter of the approach of the loved ones. They hasten to the kitchen and come back with brooms and frying pans. They hide behind the door, and when Mrs. Mann and her brother enter, in a jolly mood, they are surprised by a fusilade of pans and crushing blows from the brooms. Confusion follows, and Mrs. Mann and her brother soon get upon their knees and plead forgiveness.

The erstwhile Mr. Henpeck and poor Mrs. Prizefighter shake hands victoriously. A year later finds the disposition of both Mrs. Mann and Mr. Prizefighter entirely changed. Mr. Prizefighter is willing to feed the baby with the bottle, while Mr. Mann can lounge at peace in his armchair and smoke a cigar.

GAUMONT

WHEN HER LOVE GREW COLD (Jan. 2).—Jack Melrose writes to his wife Tessa, then visiting at her parents' home, saying that he must leave the city on an unexpected business trip. For reasons of economy he goes to a boarding house, although not pleased at the prospect of a diet of hash and prunes.

On arriving he hastily scribbles a note to Tessa, which tells of his undying devotion and that he knows nothing more adorable than the name of Tessa than Tessa herself.

Jack has a habit of becoming displeased with his letters and writing each several times before he expresses himself to his taste. Therefore, it happens that the landlady finds one of the unsent missives. The plot thickens. The landlady is also named Tessa and, let it be whispered, she is a widow! Oh, these widows!

Jack bears out his reputation as a man of letters, and continues his fervid writings to the absent Tessa. The present Tessa receives them avidly—her love-hungry heart warming under the effusions. She knows nothing of the other Tessa. She believes they are directed to her, and that bashful Jack has adopted this surreptitious method.

Jack's letters are nothing if not fervent. "I repeat every moment, yes, even gargle with it, the luscious name of Tessa. I would love you, even were you an undertaker's daughter"; "again I would gaze into the liquid depths of your soulful eyes and hear the merry ripple of your voice over a cascade of pearly teeth," are samples of Jack's epistolary ability, which in earnestness would subordinate those of the Apostle Paul in his communications to the Corinthians.

Several days have passed and the landlady feels that her cup of happiness is about to spill. She confides to a "lady fren" that after such impassioned letters, she expects him to pop like a champagne bottle cork very, very soon. While the widow's joy is risen to Vesuvian effervescence, Jack is in blissful ignorance. He finds that his business will not consume the time that he thought it would and tells the landlady that he is going away and that he would like to have his bill made out. "You shall not go until you ask me to become your wife. Would you so cruelly trifle with the affections of a trusting lorn widow, who has only one father, one mother and has just been vaccinated?" she says, and straightway exhibits to Jack the love letters which have double-barreled import.

Jack is locked in his room by the angry widow and told that he can regain his freedom only by making her his wife. Jack is a resourceful chap and knows that there is one way in which to put love to the acid test. Out of the window he drops a little note. This is what he wrote: "I sought to slip away because I am ruined. If you know any generous souls who will lend me $250, lead me to them!"

The widow consults her "lady frens," who decide that it would be unwise to marry a man who did not have even enough money to pay for the marriage license. The widow, therefore, determines that she will liberate the captive, and tells him that she is sorry and that she knows no one who will help him in his need. The story closes with Jack in the embrace of wife Tessa, telling her to kiss her favorite husband.

On the same reel:

NORTHERN EGYPT.—Interesting views of the land of antiquity, showing the marvelous engineering works which to our modern captains of industry are a lost art; the wonderful Nile, whose yearly inundations of Egypt, keep that country from becoming another Sahara. There are glimpses of the Assouan Dam, which controls the distribution of the Nile's waters in times of flood, the ruins of Thebes, the ancient city of one hundred gates, the Colossi of Memnon, two enormous statues representing Anenothos III, successor to Rameses II. These are the statues of which there is the legend that at the rise of the sun, one of these statues gives forth a musical sound, called the song of Memnon. There is shown the temple of Ramesseum, dedicated by Rameses II to Amnon, guard of the Sun, also the temple of Karnac, consecrated to the god Khons, the construction of which temple is said to have continued during several centuries. Interesting is the Avenue of Sphinxes, one and a quarter miles long, each sphinx to the number of six hundred, holding beneath its paw, the statue of Amenophes II.

GREAT NORTHERN

OUTWITTING A RIVAL (Jan. 4).—The wholesome humor incorporated in this comedy is sure to make a strong appeal to lovers of this form of entertainment. The Great Northern Company claims that it is one of the best it has presented, and there have been many that approached perfection. During a visit to America, the family of Mr. Johnson, a German capitalist, met a wealthy American whose name is Anderson. Alice is the only daughter of the Johnsons and is in love with Mark, a young journalist of her native town. Soon after the return of Johnson and his family, they receive a letter from Anderson announcing that he has just arrived and will pay them a visit. He incloses a photograph of himself, so that Alice may more closely study the features of the man who is about to propose for her hand. Mrs. Johnson is delighted, but Alice and her father never have had any great regard for the American suitor. Mark, the journalist, is annoyed and greatly disturbed in mind. While the latter is paying a visit to the Johnson home, the father, mother and daughter excuse themselves in order to greet Anderson at the station. Mark is struck with an idea and sends a telegram to Anderson in care of a station master, asking him to alight at Junction Station, some miles distant from the city. Then he sends for his friend Lund, an actor. The conspiracy is soon hatched. Lund is shown the photograph of Anderson and proceeds to make-up to resemble him. When he has finished the resemblance is remarkable.

Anderson follows instructions and gets off at Junction Station, but he finds no one to greet him upon his arrival. He waits for an hour or more and then resumes his journey to the city in which the Johnsons reside. In the meantime Johnson, his wife and daughter have grown tired of waiting for the American and return to their home. Shortly after their arrival, Lund, the actor, appears in the Anderson make-up and is warmly greeted by Mrs. Johnson. He has been in the house but a few minutes when he proceeds to drink all the liquor in sight, embraces Mrs. Johnson, overturns vases and otherwise makes a spectacle of himself. After a time he is ejected and Mrs. Johnson is obliged to admit that her choice of a husband for her daughter has been a poor one. Then it is that the real Anderson finds his way into the Johnson domicile, and the reception he receives is calculated to jar his better feelings. He is ejected by Mark, the journalist, and after Mrs. Johnson has given her consent, Papa Johnson grants the paternal blessing, "Bless You My Children." Nothing more is heard of Anderson.

By ERNST LUZ

A number of inquiries regarding appropriate music for certain scenes and action in pictures has made it necessary for me to make an exhaustive search of the many publications of music for dramatic use and while I found many numbers of merit, I found no volume or collection which I could recommend as practical or valuable to the player. Many collections contained but one number of value and a few had four or five that could be of use. The different collections contain a number of so-called "curtain music" numbers, some melodramatic, and then little space is left for the more serious numbers, which are the more important in picture playing. There seems to be an entire lack of catering to picture music on the part of the publishers and none have given a thought as to whether the picture really needs any special music. The reason for this would be a long and uninteresting story, that might better be left untold. We can all look forward to some different conditions in the future, for with the continual and rapid improvement at present seen in the pictures there can be but little doubt but what the music will also be improved, and to do this it will be necessary to adopt picture music.

Until the picture player has some repertoire of serious music, better picture music will be impossible, and until the picture player shows his interest and makes public through these or similar columns such numbers as he has found good for certain scenes or action it will be no easy task for any player to collect a suitable and sufficient repertoire. Until such interest is shown by the picture player it will be difficult to interest the publishers to cater to picture music.

Were the publishers interested 75 per cent of the picture players' worry would be a thing of the past. The picture demands music of all descriptions and should be classed as numbers that are sad, plaintive, or such that have a tendency to create a serious mood, and again numbers that are neutral, creating no specific mood, and you then have numbers which make merry, laugh, are full of life, and in every tone carry the theme of happiness. You then have numbers that impress you with the devotional spirit, the majestic and the military; all must tell you a little story of their own.

To be successful in picture playing it is necessary that you locate such numbers by personal inspiration. You must have a musical heart and allow yourself to understand the real meaning of music, for if what is played does not inspire the player, how can he hope that it may have any effect upon any other person. Read the criticisms and reviews of good musical critics and you will soon realize the true value of music to the picture. Try your different numbers on yourself and realize their sentimental or other value and you will have no difficulty in placing them to the picture appropriately. Rest assured that if they properly impress you, they will also affect others in similar manner.

* * * *

In answer to many inquiries regarding Battle Music and sneaky or Dramatic Pizzicato Music I give a few suggestions which I have found practical and which are simple and can be attained by very little application. For a battle number I have found none any better than the second and first 48 bars of the third movement of Suppe's "Poet and Peasant" overture. Repeating this gives you a good number for the longest of battle scenes and it does not become tiresome. When the battle action is very heavy or tumultuous the second movement repeated is better. At such points where the action is less noisy continue a repeat of the first 48 bars of the third movement. If the battle action drifts into a sentimental or pathetic scene the 3/8 Allegretto movement in the same number played slow is very effective and you can segue into it without any preparation.

The number can be made more effective by adding to the first and all similar bars of the second movement an accented note after the beat. B flat to be used in first, second and third bars. A in the ninth, tenth and eleventh bars. This will also accentuate cannonading. See Figs. 1 and 2. By playing the full chords and changing the bass to eighth notes in seventeenth, eighteenth, nineteenth and twentieth bars will materially simplify that portion and make it more appropriate for battle music. See Fig. 3. In all parts where the chords lay in tremolo effect play the full chord and play eighths instead of sixteenths. The twentieth and twenty-first and the twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth bars of the third movement can be made more practical by such a change. See Fig. 4.

While these changes do not help the composition, they do simplify the number and make it possible for you to put more volume into your playing, if necessary, which is essential in battle music. This overture is standard and well known and there is no reason why all pianists should not have it, for the De Luxe Edition is sold in New York for 2½ cents a copy and it is the correct arrangement.

Anyone desiring to work this out and who needs pay more for the number can receive it from me any time for that price, and I can assure them they will then have a good battle number.

Sneaky music or Dramatic Pizzicato is the most simple of all dramatic music and with little application you can get the proper effect and compose a few numbers yourself. Eight bars is the usual length of all such numbers. The two hands play the same note in unison, very saccato and short, and in slow tempo. It is always in minor key. To accomplish this familiarize yourself with the three chords of a minor key, viz.: G Minor. Tonic triad is G, B♭, D; Sub-Dominant C, E♭, G. Dominant D, F♯, A. Begin in common time very slowly and with staccato eighth notes with both hands in even tempo as follows, playing one tone after the other as mentioned, viz.: G, B♭, A, G, C, E♭, D, C, D, F♯, E♭, D, G, D, G. By playing each tone as an eighth and then observing an eighth pause you will have four bars of very simple but correct Dramatic Pizzicato. This will give you the idea of what it should be, and once you know the nature of the number you will have no difficulty in setting others of your own. See Fig. 5 and try to complete the number from the two bars I give, as it will be excellent practice, and induce you along the line of composition.

Geo. Kleine's Offering for Week Ending January 4, 1913

"Amy's Choice" is the title of the Tuesday Cines. It relates in a highly entertaining fashion of a charming girl's many difficulties in deciding between two most ardent suitors.

To complete the reel "Among the Abruzzi Mountains" offers an extremely interesting scenic, showing the ancient city of Sulmona, views of the surrounding country and several beautiful winter landscapes in the reclaimed basin of Lake Fucino.

For the Eclipse, "A Four-Footed Cupid," tells of a remarkable dog who manages to put through a deal in love all by himself. The canine seems to possess human intelligence in the manner he takes possession of the letters belonging to the quarreling lovers, and carries them to the mail-box, after which by means of many clever tricks he finally brings about a reconciliation.

"Laughing Billy" completes the reel. Billy meets a pal who tells him a funny story. Billy insists upon sharing it with every one he meets.

An absorbing drama of tender interest is billed for the release of January 4, 1913, entitled "A Sister's Heart." It relates of a proud, spirited girl, who opposes her younger brother's marriage to a young woman of humble station. Through the influence and persuasion of the old family servitor, however, the two girls are brought together, and it is not long before love conquers pride and prejudice.

TWO MORE CONVERTS

Everywhere public officials and educators are awakening to the possibilities of the moving pictures as a means of instructing large bodies of people. Two of the latest converts are Park Commissioner Stover of Manhattan and Richmond, and President Meeker of the Centenary Collegiate Institute, Hackettstown, N. J., both of whom have installed Edison Underwriters' Kinetoscopes.

The Park Commissioner has placed the machine in the Arsenal at Central Park, where it will be of inestimable value in helping the residents of the menagerie to pass the long winter evenings and will serve many other useful purposes.

The girls of the Centenary Institute are to receive part of their instruction via the picture screen, and there is no doubt that they will find the new method far more interesting than the old text-books.

The Edison people are very pleased over the choice of their machine in both cases.

PEOPLE WILL BEG

W. STEPHEN BUSH in the MOVING PICTURE WORLD says:
"Every exhibitor in the country should show the Solax production "The Woman Behind the Man." If he had the opportunity of seeing the following, he would say the same of them.

A MILLION DOLLARS
Released JANUARY 8, WEDNESDAY

A story of a clerk who wishes that all the wealth of the world were redistributed and that all men were millionaires. In a dream he has his wish, and he finds that because they have the money they need, the bricklayers refuse to work, waiters, conductors, motormen, chauffeurs, doctors, and men of all trades, stop the wheels from going 'round. In fact, he discovers that the earth stops revolving because no one cares to do the necessary work.

In this production

is the feature
Send 10c. for a four color litho of this matinee idol.

The Mutiny of Mr. Henpeck
Released JANUARY 10, FRIDAY

Mr. Man is ill-treated by his wife. She forces him to do the housework, and makes him stay at home and entertain the frail wife of her brother, a prize fighter, while she and the prize fighter go out to theatre and do the social stunts. The neglected wife and poor little Mr. Man get together, and organize a concerted action against their other halves. Pots, pans, and brooms are used as arguments.

Are You A Mechanic?

Have you an expert or even a practical knowledge of mechanical construction?

If you fill these requirements, then we have a treat in store for you when you inspect the

Simplex

The peer of motion picture projection machines.

We would like it if every man who is going to buy a moving picture machine is expert in mechanical construction so he could see, compare and judge for himself the relative merits of the machines now on the market.

Don't accept as final the word of the man who makes the machine. He is prejudiced. He has an axe to grind. Don't take our word for the supremacy of the Simplex projector.

Judge for yourself. If you haven't the special experience necessary, surely you are acquainted with someone who has that knowledge; who is an expert mechanic and unprejudiced. Ask him to go with you to look at different makes of machines. Pay him for his services, if necessary. It will be money well invested.

We are willing to submit the Simplex for inspection and test to any unprejudiced expert.

The Simplex projects absolutely flickerless, steady pictures. No eyestrain where the Simplex is used. Anyone but a blind man can see that, but the mechanism which projects the pictures—will it stand up? What is it going to cost for repairs? Is it easy to make adjustments and replace parts? Will it project as good a picture in six months or a year as it does when new?

These are the points to know, not guess at, when you spend your good money for a machine.

Write us today for catalogue B and name and address of nearest dealer who has the Simplex projector in stock.
